INTRODUCTORY.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE GUERRILLAS—COURAGE AND PATIENCE—A ROUGH CODE OF MORALS— PRIDE IN THEIR HORSES.

“A blush as of roses,
Where rose never grew,
Great drops on the bunch grass
But not of the dew!
A taint in the sweet air
For wild birds to share
A stain that shall never Bleach out in the sun.”

The great Republic of America is only in the morning of her days. Time has not yet plowed one wrinkle on her wide shining brow. Young among the empires of the earth, she has given proof of dauntless courage and of a most astonishing vitality. And if the past be a fair augury for the future, then it is safe to prophesy that America will be no laggard in the race of Nations. The pages of her brief history are rich in romance and replete with instruction. Her young days, were days crowded with earnest, honest toil. The sturdy pioneer swung his axe in the forest, and the wild woods echoed back the music of happy work. And if these pioneer days of America were more prosy than poetic, they were certainly not unhappy. With growth comes danger. With prosperity comes peril. The great Republic had scarcely marched into the old age of her first century when the crowning disaster of Civil War darkened the land from Atlantic to Pacific. The storm had been long gathering. The crash was inevitable. It was manifest destiny that North and South should meet in deadly conflict. The dwellers at the base of Mount Vesuvius hear for many days, mutterings and grumblings deep and low, before the fiery crater belches forth her tides of burning lava. And thoughtful men given to examining carefully the signs of the times foresaw for many a day that nothing less than a baptism of blood would purge the land from the "perilous stuff," that threatened its well-being.

The shot fired on Fort Sumter echoed round the world and announced that the great testing time for America had come. Saddest of all things sad,—for a country young or old—is the scourge of civil war. War in any form, under any circumstances, is an unmitigated curse. But when the strife is between brothers born beneath the same flag, and nurtured in the same Fatherland, then "Glorious War" crowns herself with her chief horrors!

"When Greek meets Greek
Then comes the tug of war."

And when the Boys in Blue met the Boys in Grey, then came a conflict long and bloody and remorseless. That war-stained page is the saddest, but not the least instructive of all America's young history. That page is damp yet with the blood of the bravest in all the land, and saturated with the tears of the bereaved and broken-hearted. That page records—concerning both sides—a bravery that knew no parallel, an endurance that was sublime.

One of the chief curses of a civil war is the legacy of bitterness and strife it leaves behind it. The seeds sown through all its gory fields wave in the harvests of subsequent years. And feuds are engendered that live through many generations. Indeed it is utterly impossible to exaggerate, by any form of speech the monstrous brood of evils to which these bloody wars give birth. The borders of Missouri and Kansas were smitten, as with a curse, by the daring exploits of as wild a band of marauders as ever laughed law and authority to scorn. These guerrilla bands, of which the bloodthirsty Quantrell was a chief, and Jesse and Frank James renowned subalterns—were the offspring of the war. They have been fitly described as “The sable fringe on the blood red garments of civil strife.” These wild intrepid warriors loved to be feared. To have their names become signs of terror and dismay fed their pride, and the topmost height of their ambition was to be dreaded. They established in their own persons an aristocracy of reckless daring. They were cruel as they were cunning. They blended in their character the remorseless cruelty of the tiger, with the subtlety of the fox. They were prodigal of life. Shedding human blood had no horrors for them. They would spill blood as freely as they would spill water, and with just as little reluctance or care. A guerrilla would ask no quarter he would give none! The word compromise, and what the word represented, was not in his lexicon. He was a follower of Quantrell's black flag and scorned to be afraid. When death came he met it, and died as the Red Indian dies—stoical, silent, and grim as a stone.

There were, however, elements of character developed by these border banditti worthy of a nobler cause. They were as courageous as the Spartans of the old heroic age. They were as valorous as the Roman in his military pride. They recognized cowardice as the chief crime, and courage as the cardinal virtue. A man who under any circumstances or in answer to any plea, would think of parleying with a foe, even if that foe were his brother or kinsman, was unfit to follow Quantrell's dread lead, and a man who would dream of craving mercy for himself could have no place beneath the Guerrilla's black banner of death. To kill, or to be killed, without the movement of a muscle or the throbbing of a nerve was the business of these outlaws. To this stern iron courage they added a most sagacious and unwearying patience. They were tireless in their strange vigils. Detailed to watch around a farmstead or a mountain pass, they would lie in secret ambush for weeks. And through all sorts of weather, in cold or heat, in hunger or thirst, they would wait and watch unseen, till in the early morning, or by the clouded moonlight their unsuspecting victims would ride along. A dozen pistol shots would ring through the silent night; the doomed riders would fall dead from their horses; and without a word the guerillas would return to Quantrell's camp to announce their task accomplished. They led a strange unequal life. There was no "even tenor" in their way. Hungry almost to starvation to-day, to-morrow they would be banqueting in luxury. To-day, merry and glad and free; filling the air with jocund laughter, making the hill-sides echo with their wild songs; to-morrow riding for dear life, at break-neck speed, in the very teeth of danger, pursuing or pursued; following their foes, or being hunted like wild beasts. Such was the certain uncertainty of their lives. The genius who presides over the fortunes of war is a fickle jade. Fickle to regular organized armies, but a thousand times more fickle to these irregular warriors of the Border.

But there was one thing to be admired in the rough regulations of the Banditti. There was no spirit of coercion. No recruit was kept against his will. Free to come, he was also free to go. If wearied of the strife, no attempt was made to retain him. The deserters from these ranks of desperadoes were very few. The life once entered upon seemed to grow in wild romance. - Every startling escapade gave promise of something still more exciting to follow. Every successful raid sharpened the appetite for another fray. Every taste of dan-er aroused within him the spirit of wild revolt.

Much has been said and written in harsh condemnation of these guerrilla bands; and their deeds were appalling enough to warrant the harshest condemnation. It must nevertheless be admitted that they, after their fashion, illustrated the old adage that there is "honor amongst thieves." They had a rough and ready code of morals. The very fashion of their challenge was an indication suggestive of some due appreciation of character. The old highwayman would bid you stand and deliver with the brief formula, "Your money or your life. The challenge of the picket on the Potomac was "Who goes there?" and if the challenge was unanswered after being thrice repeated, the picket fired. The guerrilla's challenge was brief and his action quick—"Who are you?" he cried; he paused a moment, and if no answer came he fired.

Much has been said to the charge of these guerrillas for which they are by no means responsible. Every mean and dastardly thing done in the war was charged to their account. There followed the armies of both North and South a string of miserable, idle thieves, who robbed the dying and plundered the dead. Human fiends whose meanness was only equalled by their craven cowardice. Parasites who preyed not on the living but on the dead. These shameless wretches had, as may be well imagined, no reverence for the sanctity of women. When their greed was satisfied, then they sought for the gratification of their lust. And of course the fairer and the gentler their victims were, the more determinately did they enforce them to the satisfaction of their diabolical desires. What mattered! Dying or dead, women or children! These ghouls of perdition had burned out every element of humanity in the fires of their brutal passions. The vulture clutching its prey, the wild tiger in the jungle were not less merciful than these inhuman creatures, whose ears were deaf and whose hearts were stone to the prayers and pleadings of helpless children and innocent, unoffending women. And for all these barbarous exploits the guerrillas were unjustly held responsible. Cruel and bold and desperate the guerrillas were, but never mean. They knew how to be faithful to a friend, as well as to be bitter to a foe. There was a Free Masonry amongst them held very sacred. And fidelity to each other was one of its chief elements. Strict disciplinarians, they were ordered to respect the purity of women and the helplessness of children in all their rough warfare, and they obeyed the regulation.

Their skillful horsemanship and their love for their horses was quite a distinctive feature in their rude characters. Their wild, dashing, flying, rather than riding, would almost favor the impression that they must have been cradled on horseback. And there soon sprung up between the horse and his rider something very nigh akin to affection. If one must go hungry, the guerrilla was content to accept the situation and give the corn he needed himself to his horse. In the keen, bitter nights of winter the horse must be well blanketed however the rider fared. Many stories, that have almost a fabulous air, are told of the almost human sense displayed by these horses of the guerrillas. They were as eager in battle as their masters, and when swiftness and silence were needed they knew how to speed on without the stimulus of whip or spur, never once disturbing the stillness by neigh or whinny. There is something to be said for a man who is kind to his horse. He will not make a less valiant soldier because he is thoughtful of the steed who shares with him the fortunes of the fray. Indeed, it has often been said that a soldier's treatment of his horse might be taken as a fair indication of his fitness for the field of battle. Murat, the great French general, used to say, that the best and bravest among the cuirassiers were those who embraced their horses before they did their mistresses.

Amongst the bravest and most daring of Quantrell's desperate followers; amongst the most uncompromising and determined of this wild, lawless horde, that kept the borders of Kansas and Missouri in perpetual fear and turmoil, were Jesse and Frank James. The fearless exploits of these brothers have gone on for more than twenty years. They have been hunted in vain by thousands of armed men. Rewards have been offered for their capture, amounting in all to seventy-five thousand dollars. But the rewards have been offered in vain. Fleet and fickle as the wandering wind, they have eluded their pursuers. They are still outlaws, but free.

CHAPTER II.

THE JAMES FAMILY.

LIFE A DRAMA — THE MISSOURI PARSONAGE — REV
ROBERT JAMES—THE MOTHER OF THE BANDITS.

“All the world’s a stage.
And all the men and women merely players
They have their exits and their entrances,
And each man in his turn
—Shakespeare.

There is nothing half so strange in all the realm of fiction, as may be found in the stern facts of life. The novelist may charm us with his dreams of the wonderful; but when the chequered lives of men pass before us in all their strange variety of experience, the novelist’s dreams fade utterly away, in the presence of the real wonders that throb and thrill through the common histories of men. The world is the real stage after all, and men and women are the only real players. The mimic stage where the actor frets and fumes his hour away, is but a passing show, to amuse, perchance to instruct. But it is in the world's theatre of life where you will find how the true actors groan out and die their tragedy, or laugh in merriest mood all through the comedy of being. On the hills and in the low lands; in the quiet farmstead and the crowded city; by the camp-fire of the wanderer and in the wigwam of the Indian; before the mast, daring the tempest in its wildest fury; in the mine, digging for earth's secret treasures; here, and in all places where pulses throb and human hearts are beating, the true drama of life is being evermore enacted. Not in the airy speculations of romance, not in the dreams of the poet; but in the lives of men is the secret of the truly wonderful.

The story of these pages is an illustration of this sentiment. The history of these Border Bandits, Frank and Jesse James, is a record of thrilling fact and bold adventure calling back the memories of Robin Hood and Little John, and all the merry men of Sherwood forest; or the later exploits of Dick Turpin and the midnight marauders of the old world.

Jesse and Frank James were born of respectable well-to-do parents and in circumstances that gave little indication of their future remarkable career. Sometimes a morning breaks in calm and placid beauty; the sky is cloudless and the sun shines bright and fair; but before noon the thunder rolls its angry chariot, and the sky is black with storm and tempest. And you wonder that a day that dawned so fair could hold concealed in its shining bosom so fierce a tempest. And surely no prophet could have foretold so dark and appalling a career for these two boys; cradled and nurtured as they were amid so much of hope and promise. Their early home was in Clay County in the State of Missouri. The Rev. Robert James, the father of these boys, came from

“The Old Kentucky Shore.”

He was a minister, of no small renown, of the Baptist denomination. He was what is known in that body as a thorough-going, uncompromising close Communist. He is spoken of by some as a sort of natural genius, who by native good sense managed to get along well without the aid of many books or much culture. While on the other hand he is described as a man of wide culture and scholarship. Whether he ever graduated at Georgetown College as his friends aver, is hard to tell. This at least is certain. He was a man of firm purpose and indomitable will. He knew well how to put common qualities to their best possible uses. If he had only little mental capital in stock he knew how to make the best of the little he had. He was a man of decided and pronounced opinions. Evidently intended to be a ruler and controller of men. He was a great favorite with his own Missouri congregation, and he was a most welcome visitor to other churches. But he was most of all in demand for camp-meeting services. There, he was in his glory. He possessed that indispensable gift — necessary for effective camp-meeting exhortation — the gift of rugged, burning, persuasive eloquence. It was enough for him to rise in any audience, however vast, to command instant attention. In those old days, when the camp meeting was a genuine reality—and not an organized religious show made to pay, such as camp meetings are in these degenerate times—the rocks and upland glens of Kentucky and Missouri, reverberated with his sonorous voice and the tossing pines] bore the echoes of his matchless eloquence far into the silent night. He was a veritable Boanerges, a son of Thunder. There was no marked gentleness in his manner, whatever there may have been of tenderness in his heart. He was a man of all but irresistible force as an exhorter. Many a hardened man, unused to the melting mood, was terrified into anxious thought, by the stern and terrible denunciations with which Mr. James sought to arouse the abandoned. He would bid them “flee from the wrath to come,” in tones of thunder. And when he essayed, as was often the case, a description of what the wrath to come was—when he portrayed the fierceness of the fires, the quenchlessness of the flames, the agony of the despairing, the torture of demons, the moaning and wailing and gnashing of teeth—it was positively awful! He seemed to be for the time utterly beside himself. He seemed as one who, if he had not himself trod the rugged pavement of the damned, had ventured to the very brink of perdition, and had inhaled the smoke of their torment which goeth up forever and ever. And his auditors were oftentimes smitten with alarm as though the fires of Gehenna were near at hand to devour them. These moods of wild entreaty, were for the most part, confined to the camp meeting. In the ordinary discharge of his pastoral duties he was most gentle and winning. A weird prophet of the hills; his mouth full of hard sayings, and his face set like brass against the sins of his age; he was nevertheless the calmest and meekest of apostles in the midst of his Missouri flock. And though a whole generation has passed away, since he found a grave where the tall sequios rear their lofty branches above the plain; he is still remembered with deep and real gratitude by many to whom his kind and faithful ministrations were rendered so long ago. He looked after his farm and guarded and shepherded his religious flock with simple fidelity. He may be said to have filled not unworthily the outline of Goldsmith's village pastor.

“ Thus to relieve one wretched was his pride,
And e'en his failings leaned to virtue's side;
But in his duty, prompt to every call
He watched and wept, he prayed and felt for all;
And as a bird each fond endearment tries
To tempt its new-fledged offspring to the skies
He tried each art, reproved each dull delay
Allured to brighter words and led the way.”

The mother of these boys was of a sterner kind. Miss Zerelda Cole, whom the Rev. Mr. James married, when quite young, was never overburdened with gentleness of spirit. Her temper and bearing were most imperious. Of the sweetness and amiability which we always associate with womanhood, she seemed to be, for the most part, devoid. One glance at her portrait is enough to convince one of the iron sternness of her disposition, a large, wide mouth with lips compressed in awful firmness, and eyes that seem to be homes of angry fires rather than fountains of happy smiles. The whole countenance is most forbidding. Her form was angular and masculine. A tall, gaunt presence to inspire fear rather than to invite confidence. And yet, while she had no superfluous sympathies to throw away, she gained the reputation of being kind and helpful where kindness and help were really needed. She had no sentimental tears to shed, but she had a strong hand and a willing mind to help bear the real burdens of the weak and sad. So if Goldsmith's picture will serve for the Rev. Robert James, Sir Walter Scott's fine lines will not be inappropriate for Mrs. Zerelda James :

“ O, woman, in our hours of ease,
Uncertain, coy, and hard to please;
And variable as the shade
By the light quivering aspen made
When pain and anguish ring the brow,
A ministering angel thou.”

DEATH OF REV. MR. JAMES--THE WIDOW'S STRUGGLES
DEVELOPMENT OF THE YOUNG GUERRILLAS.

Frank James was born in Scott County, Kentucky, in 1841. Jesse was born in Clay County, Missouri, in 1845. There were beside these two boys, two daughters. The elder of the girls just reached the threshold of beautiful womanhood when, to the regret of all who knew her, she passed away. The remaining daughter, Susan, went to live in Nebraska, and there became the wife of Mr. L. Parmer. They made their permanent home in Sherman, Texas. Frank was an infant in arms when Mr. and Mrs. James removed from Kentucky to Clay County, Missouri; so that all the young life of these embryo bandits is associated with the Baptist Parsonage of New Hope Church. One would hardly have expected that such a home would have been a cradle for such relentless, bloodthirsty men. But it is hard for such relentless, bloodthirsty men. But it is hard to tell. It seems sometimes as if circumstances had, after all, very little to do in making character. They certainly seem to be less potent than is commonly believed. It is presumable that even Judas said his prayers at his mother's knee. Certain it is, that he was surrounded with the most sacred influences and advantages, and yet, in spite of all, the world accords him his place as the arch-traitor of all the ages. The fairest flowers are often found on the least cultured lands. The sons of ministers of the Gospel have often proved to be the wildest and most unsteady of all young men. As the auld Scotch-wife said: "The worst deils o' the 'parish are aye to be found at the Manse." And for this there must be some reason; and that reason is generally to be found in the fact that there is too often in the minister's house a lack of that wholesome restraint that forms such an indispensable element in the culture of the young. It is the old story ever repeated, Eli restrained not his sons, and they dishonored their father's name and became a bye-word and a shame in Ancient Israel.

In the previous chapter the characteristics of the parents of these boys were portrayed. The father and the mother of these boys were strongly dissimilar in their mental and moral temperaments. Mr. James was a man who had less force of character than his wife. And moreover he was so constantly absorbed in his pastoral duties, that he left the government of the house, if it could be called government at all, to his stronger-minded spouse. He saw little of his children, and had very little influence upon them. They were very young; and in the earliest years of life, the mothers have always the mightiest control of the young folks. It was especially so in this case. The mother stamped her impress deep and legible upon her sons.

In the year 1850 an important event transpired in the home of the minister of Clay. The discovery of the gold fields of California had spread its feverish excitement far and wide. Not only the whole of America, but Europe became largely interested. If the Philosopher's stone was not found, the gold was found, and that was better still. The eyes of the Old world have many a time been turned longingly toward the new, and never with a wilder enthusiasm than in the year 1858. Men were a good deal more anxious to go to the "Diggings" than pious people were to go to the New Jerusalem. California was better than Jerusalem new or old. It was the true Eldorado, the bright land of gold, and young men, and men who had passed the fullness and strength of middle life, gave up home and quiet, and tolerably easy circumstances, charmed by the bewildering dream, that they might suddenly become rich, and spend the rest of their lives in affluence and ease. But as Ireland's sweet minstrel the poet Moore says:

"The World is all a fleeing show,
To man's illusion given."

And so these golden promises in the overwhelming majority of instances charmed only to betray. There were many of these adventurers who "struck gold." But the greater number struck bad luck, disappointment and despair. Till "Damn the Luck" became the common phrase on almost every digger's lips. The far away lands, that catch the first breezes of the Pacific have become the sepulchre of thousands who left their quiet homes to find an untimely grave, instead of a fortune. The tall dark mountains and the lofty sequois overshadow the unknown tombs of many a brave and valient youth, and serve as silent mourners of the unknown and luckless dead.

In this year 1850, the Rev. Mr. James caught the gold-fever and determined to take his chances with the rest who

"Over the Mountains Of the Moon,
Down the Valley of the Shadow Rode, boldly rode,
In search of El Dorado."

He had been preceded by a brother, whose rose colored descriptions of California and its wealth helped in bringing Mr. James to a decision on this point. What plans he formed in his own mind is not known. He probably thought that his absence from Missouri would not necessarily be long. He bade his Flock at New Hope Church farewell and started out on a prospecting tour. From this tour he never returned. He was stricken by some mortal disease. Away from home and kindred he died untended and unwatched, and now lies in an unknown grave, where the rays of the setting sun leave their last faint sad smiles.

Frank was nine years old and Jesse barely five, when the sad tidings of the father's death reached Clay County. The tidings were sad enough for the widow and the orphans, but after all it was no doubt best that the father should be spared the sad history of his sons. Better far that he should be sleeping, the "long sweet sleep that knows no waking" than live to see his sons brought to such dishonor.

Mrs. James was not left wholly unprovided for. She had to struggle pretty hard for a good many years. But she had nothing weak or sentimental in her nature and struggling suited her well. The boys spent some time in a district school. But the records do not indicate that they were very diligent or very successful in their studies. Years passed on, years of struggle and hard work. At last in 1857 Dr. Reuben Samuels a native of Kentucky was brave and bold enough to propose for the hand of the Widow James, and it required some bravery no doubt. She was no coy blushing maiden to be wooed and won by the sweet blandishments of love. She was a widow well on in years. A woman who had been accustomed to sway the scepter of power at Clay Farm; and if Dr. Samuels meant business well and good. But she wanted and would have no fooling. Probably the Doctor had known her in the old Kentucky days, and knowing her disposition, ordered himself accordingly. The offer was accepted.

And they then were married. But if the Doctor could have foreseen what perils lay before him, he might perchance have paused.

The boys, Frank and Jesse, were now beginning to reveal those elements of character that, fully developed, have made their names at once the curse and shame of Missouri. Of the milk of human kindness they had none. They seem to have drunk in from their earliest days only bitterness and malice, and all evil. While they were quite young they quarreled and fought like young demons. They hated with the hatred of the most remorseless cruelty. The jocund laughter of innocent youth seldom broke from their lips; but, instead, oaths and curses, and bitter threats mingled with gross profanity. From their eyes broke no kindly beams, but there flashed the fires of ungovernable hate. They had no pleasant playmates. They wanted none. Their whole disposition was to bully and abuse and domineer; and sometimes they carried this spirit to a shameful degree. One instance will serve as an illustration: When Frank was thirteen and Jesse barely eleven, one of the boys near their farm, himself only thirteen, was unfortunate enough to give these young fiends some offence. The brothers waited their time for vengeance. At last it came, the boys met in a large, lonely forest. The boy Smithers, who had incurred the ill-will of the Jameses, was not equal to do battle with both the brothers, so they succeeded in administering a most merciless castigation. But this did not appease their anger. It was the spring-time, and the streams of Missouri were rich and full. Frank and Jesse procured thongs of bark and tied and bound the hands of young Smithers and threw him a dozen times, bruised and bleeding as he was, into a deep pond. He begged and pleaded that they would desist. But he pleaded in vain. The more he suffered the more they were delighted. At last growing tired of this method of torment, the young fiends, after extorting all sorts of apologies from the half-drowned boy, finished their day's sport by tying him hand and foot to a great tree, and leaving him there to whatsoever chances fate might bring. It was early morning when this inhuman scene transpired. It was not till sundown that some chance passer-by released poor Smithers, more dead than alive from his painful captivity. The poor lad was thrown into a fever from which he did not recover for many weeks. Thus before the elder of these boys had well got into his teens, the cruel murderous spirit was manifest.

A favorite pastime with these boys was to torture dumb animals. Cutting off the ears and tails of dogs and cats, and the wings of birds, was a cherished practice, and the pitiful cries of the dumb suffering things was a sort of music they delighted in. Everything that gave pain gave them pleasure. A little fellow living near the farm, a namesake of the elder boy, had a little pet dog, a rat-and-tan, called Fan. For some reason or other, this lad had managed to offend the young tyrants, and so to get even with him they watched for the little dog Fan; and at last securing it they cut off its tail, clipped its ears, then hung it by a cord to the branch of a tree, while they dug a deep hole; after which, despite its almost human looks of piteous pleadings, they buried the dog alive! and afterward boasted of the fun! Such was the budding promise of the boyhood of Frank and Jesse James.

While they were quite young, their step-father, Dr. Samuels, presented each of them with a small double-barrel shot-gun and all the paraphernalia of a thoroughly equipped sportsman. This was quite an era in their history, and now they began a ceaseless and unwearied gun practice. They were soon very efficient and successful sportsmen, and neither bird, nor rabbit, nor squirrel escaped their guns. Guns soon gave way to pistols. The boys had heard of the wild adventurers of the Borders; of their wonderful skill in the use of those deadly weapons; and so by careful saving they were soon able to gratify their ambition and became each of them possessed of a pistol. They practiced in dead-earnest from early daylight, and very soon they became masters of the art of pistol shooting; and their awful success in their many bloody frays in after years was largely owing to their persevering practice in their young days. So thoroughly efficient had they become, so precise and accurate their aim, that they would measure a distance of fifteen paces from a tree standing in an open space, and commence walking around it, firing, what to an on-looker would appear to be only random shots. But every shot would tell, and by and by the tree would be completely riddled round with a ring of pistol shots. They went from achievement to achievement, with perseverance worthy of a much nobler cause. Not satisfied with being good shots as they stood or walked, they began to practice on horse-back; and before very long they were able, riding at full gallop around a circle with a tree in the centre, at a distance of seventy-five paces to completely girdle the tree with revolver bullets, never missing a single shot. This strange wild apprenticeship thoroughly fitted these ill-starred youths for the dark destiny that awaited them, and made them most dangerous foes to all who crossed their path or thwarted their dread purposes.

CHAPTER IV.

QUANTRELL'S CAMP.

THE WAND OF CIRCUMSTANCES—QUANTRELL'S EARLY DAYS—THE BLOOD-THIRSTY JAY-HAWKERS—MUR-DER AND PLUNDER—DAYS AND NIGHTS OF TERROR—FIGHTING THE WOLVES BY THE
TRELL THE INTREPID GUERRILLA CHIEF.

Charles William Quantrell was without a doubt the greatest of all the cheiftains of those wild lawless bands who afflicted the borders of Kansas and Missouri for so many years. No King was ever more absolute with his subjects, than Quantrell was with his guerrilla followers. As to his personal authority and influence there are not two opinions. His word was law. His will was obeyed without a question. Whenever the Black Flag of Quantrell was reared, it meant death and doom without parley or compromise. As to Quantrell himself opinions were strangely divided. He has been described by some as "a highway robber crossed upon a tiger;" while others have spoken of him as "as a gallant defender of his native South." It is the fortune, or misfortune of men of more than common power to awake conflicting estimates of their character. The same man, who is in the eyes of his friends and followers, a heaven-born champion of the right; is to his foes an unscrupulous usurper and fanatic.

Quantrell's was a strange career. Was he an Avenging Nemesis of the Right? Or a monster of murder's foul brood? It is not too much to say that circumstances;—or rather it should be said one baleful set of circumstances—helped to make him what he became. His career as a leader of banditti was unthought of, undreamed of; and all the training of his young days seemed to point in the direction of a peaceful life.

But the wand of circumstance, or fate, call it which you will, swept over him, and in one awful night, the peaceful unoffending youth became a living vengeance, an incarnate terror!

Quantrell was born in Hayerstown, Maryland, on the 20th July 1836. He was very early bereft of a father's care, but from his young days onward he was a gentle and obedient son to his widowed mother. About sixteen years of age he went to reside at Cleveland, Ohio, in order that he might enjoy the advantages of a liberal education. Here he stayed for some years, little dreaming of the future that awaited him. He had a brother much older than himself living in Kansas City. This elder brother urged Charles William to leave Ohio and settle down in Kansas, this was agreed upon, but before settling down to the business of life, it was resolved that they should take a journey together to California. This was in the year 1856. They planned to go by wagons; they had with them one negro, to cook and pitch their tent and serve them generally. There were at this time blood-thirsty bands of men, known as Lane's Jay-hawkers, who under the name of Abolitionists desiring freedom in Kansas, went up and down murdering and plundering in the most atrocious and cold-blooded way.

The brothers Quantrell were en route for California "The bright land of Gold" as the gold seekers fondly called it. One night they had pitched their tent on the banks of the Cottonwood River. It was one of those early summer evenings when nature seems to wear her richest robes of beauty, the setting sun shot parting beams of golden glory on river, and hill and vale. The evening meal was over, and the brothers were sitting on the river bank talking quietly of other days, and canvassing future prospects. Sambo was busy fixing the tent for the night. All was peace and quiet, when suddenly a band of thirty of these Kansas Jay-hawkers broke in on the unsuspecting encampment. The sharp crack of the pistols was the first sound that broke the silence. The work was quick and effective. The elder brother was shot dead on the river-bank. Charles William was riddled with bullets and left for dead. Plunder followed murder. Watches, rings everything that was valuable was taken from the dead, and as they thought dying man. The negro was ordered to gather up all the supplies.

The tent was placed upon its waggon, negro and wagons and horses were then driven off and Quantrell heard of them no more.

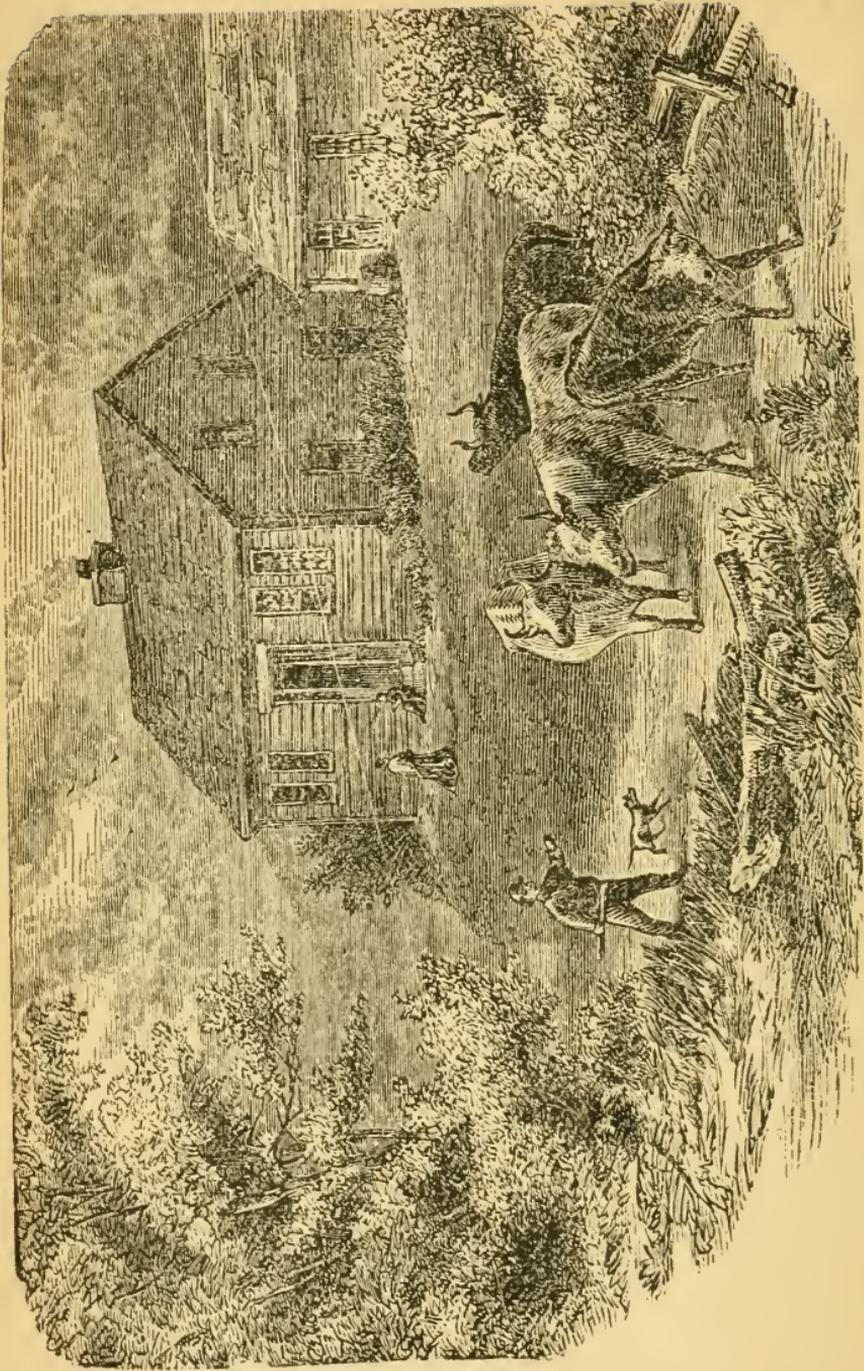

Wounded and bleeding the younger Quantrell lay unconscious till the morning. The bleeding ceased but an awful fever set in. And in this fever he raged and raved. By the second night he became somewhat conscious, and as he heard the flapping of buzzard's wings, and not far away the ominous howling of hungry wolves; he crawled to where his dead brother lay, and all that awful night, and all next day kept sacred vigil by the dead and fought away the birds of prey and the angry wolves. Faint and sore, and weak from loss of blood; he rolled himself down to the river's brink to quench his thirst. But he did not wish to die. He was resolved to live! To live to be avenged!

On the morning of the third day after the Jayhawkers' raid an old Shawnee Indian, Golightly Spieback chanced to pass by, and his kind old heart warmed to the suffering lad. He staunched his wounds, he dug a grave and helped to bury the murdered brother. There was no coffin or shroud, nor priest nor passing bell. When the rude funeral was ended the grand old Shawnee invited the chief mourner of that sad scene to a place in his wagon, and promised to drive him by easy stages to his Indian home. Charles William Quantrell accepted Spieback's kindness. But before he left that spot "by horror haunted," he fell upon his knees by the grave-side of him, who had been more like a father than a brother through all the years of his orphanage, and swore eternal vengeance against all the Jayhawking tribe!

Call that scene by the Cottonwood River the wand of circumstance, or of fate, or the wand of "murder most foul;" waving over the head of young Quantrell, it marked out his destiny and made him bitter, relentless, without mercy whenever the name of a Jayhawker was breathed.

Years passed by and the warfare of the Border grew more and more furious. Quantrell gathered round him such men as Todd and Scott, Anderson and Blant, Yager and Hulse and Gregg, the Younger Brothers—and the heroes of these pages, Frank and Jesse James. He became chief of the chiefs. The master spirit of the guerrilla's of Missouri. Many a young Missourian flushed with a wild ambition, longed for the honor of a place in Quantrell's camp, and craved for themselves no greater joy than the free wild life of those who followed Quantrell's Black Banner of Death.

A GUERRILLA.

The wild exploits of Quantrell's lawless band fell like a charm on the spirit of young Frank James. Probably the stories he heard were greatly exaggerated. But the free reckless life, the daring and the danger, the romance of the day, and the stories by the camp-fire at night, the companionship of defiant spirits who could be merry in the midst of peril, and laugh in the very face of death; all these things, seen with the eager eyes of romantic youth, served to complete the enchantment. And Frank, tired of the monotony of the farm and the uneventful life he led, resolved to cast in his lot with these wild bandits of western Missouri. No dream of wealth or honor lured him on. It was just the spirit of wild adventure that possessed him. And so in the twilight gloaming of an evening in the early spring of 1862, Frank, well armed, saddled his horse and bade farewell forever to the peaceful pursuits of life, to become a robber and a murderer!

It should not be overlooked, however, that these guerrillas were not regarded universally as of the robber brood, exclusively. They were not only tolerated in many of their awful raids, but actually encouraged by many strong partizans, as avengers of brutal and unprovoked wrongs. Robin Hood of old renown—the lawless master of Sherwood forest—was not regarded as such a dreadful moral delinquent, when he nobbed fat, wealthy Monks and Abbots, and ramsacked Abbey and Cloister to feed the starving poor. And when these wild followers of Quantrell brought swift vengeance home to a group of Federal militia-men, or a band of Kansas Jayhawkers, they were openly applauded.

The Samuels family were very strongly Southern in their sympathies. Both the Doctor and his wife had brought from their native Kentucky uncompromising attachment to Southern institutions. Their hearts were thoroughly in the movement for secession. And as we have already seen, Mrs. Samuels was thorough in all things; and in this matter she took a firm and definite stand. She could not be called a politician. But she could act like one. She hated the Northern cause. She hated the sight of the Boys in Blue. And not being disposed ever to hide her light under a bushel, it soon became pretty widely known, that if she could aid in the discomforture of the Federal soldiers, she would not scruple much as to the means to attain such an end. Indeed there is no doubt that she was often secretly at work. Quantrell could count upon her help, and never once found her information to be misleading. She would find out—by what means it would be hard to tell—the movement and plans of the Federal troops, and then Jesse in the darkness of the night, would mount his swiftest horse and ride through the gloomy wilderness of western Missouri and never halt till he had delivered all his important tidings to the guerrilla chief. Her house had often been the scene of secret midnight conferences.

The Federal militia men suspected that the Samuels were their secret foes, and after a long period of non-interference they came down upon the Kearney farm and committed one of those brutal outrages which very nearly cost Dr. Samuels his life.

It was in the month of June, 1862, a very short time after Frank's departure, a company of Missouri militia presented themselves at the farm near Kearney, in Clay County. They were resolved to make an example of the whole family. They first of all met Dr. Samuels, whom they addressed in language that could leave no doubt in his mind that they meant to carry affairs to the bitter end. It was in vain he pleaded that he was leading a peaceful farmer's life, and didn't desire to be mixed up in the strife of the time. They told him — what he knew much better than they did—that he and his whole family were in secret alliance with Quantrell and his followers. Frank was at the camp, Susie was away from home, Jesse was ploughing in the fields. Mrs. Samuels was nowhere to be seen. But she saw all that was going on, all the same.

They had not come unprepared for their work. They produced a strong, stout rope with which they securely pinioned the unresisting Dr. Samuels. Amid jeers and ribald jests they hurried him into a wood within sight of his home. After further insult, they fastened a rope into a noose round his neck, then throwing the other end of the rope over the limb of a tree, they drew him up hastily and with farewell curses left him to choke to death. They then went in quest of Jesse whom they intended to treat in a similar manner. Meantime Mrs. Samuels who had been an unseen witness of the hanging of her husband, came to the rescue, and with almost super-human strength, climbed the tree and managed to cut him down, then carried him, more dead than alive, back to the house. And by long and patient nursing managed to save his life.

Meantime these gallant warriors went in search of Jesse. Here was a boy of barely sixteen years of age, on whom the men who bore the name of soldiers, were about to wreck their vengeance. They charged him with being a medium of communication with Quantrell. They put a rope round his neck and told him that his hour had come. If they thought by these means to intimidate him they were gravely mistaken, for Jesse turned upon them a look of stolid and scornful indifference. His youth and manifest courage had some influence with his tormenters, so after further abuse and after pricking him freely, they gave utterance to the most awful threats with their swords, garnished with sundry oaths, as to what they would do if he ever dared to ride to Quantrell's camp again with any message good, bad, or indifferent. Supposing that they had made a full end of Dr. Samuels, and being pretty well satisfied with their day's diversions, they departed leaving Jesse to follow his plow.

Not long after, hearing that Dr. Samuels was still alive and that Jesse was still taking his midnight rides, a second raid was effected, and it was determined that this time both Dr. Samuels and Jesse must die. But the birds had flown! Neither the Doctor, nor Jesse could be found. Mrs. Samuels and her daughter Susie were at home. But they refused point blank to give any information. The soldiers threatened, but did not alarm the women. And especially from Mrs. Samuels, who was a magnificent hater, the soldiers got as good as they gave. Greatly enraged at being baulked of their chief prey, they arrested Mrs. and Miss Samuels and took them to the jail at St. Josephs. Here they were kept for weeks in a place reeking with filth and vermin. And they were subjected to all sorts of course brutal jests and obscene conversation from their vulgar-minded guards. But Mrs. Samuel's indomitable spirit did not forsake her. And what they uttered in insult, she answered back in scorn.

This last outrage filled Jesse's cup of determination to the brim. All his ambition was, to march to the music of guerrilla warfare. It is said that he had already begged to be admitted to Quandrell's wild confederacy, but had been refused on account of his youth. Now he was resolved. The attempted murder of his step-father, the imprisonment of his mother and sister in a miserable, loathsome dungeon was more than enough, to say nothing of the threats and insult that had been offered to himself. So without delay Jesse saddled his horse and turning his back upon a home that had grown intolerable, and now had become unsafe, he followed the wake of his brother Frank. He was barely sixteen, with a smooth, handsome face, deep blue eyes and a complexion as soft and delicate as a girl's. There seemed to be in him no material out of which to make a bandit and a murderer. But the die was cast. The fashion of his life was set. The brothers were together now, following the same banner, marching in the same bloody path. Destined to be for many a long year twin wraiths of slaughter.

CHAPTER VI.

THE TERRIBLE GUERRILLA OATH.

QUANTRELL'S SAGACITY—SYSTEM AND ORDER IN THE CAMP—THE DREADFUL OATH.

If the sagacity and energy, the strong common sense and indomitable perseverance of Quantrell had been devoted to some worthy object in life, they would have secured for him an honorable place in society. He was a man of great foresight, and very soon discovered that if there was an absence of system and order and discipline amongst his followers; his band, instead of being compact like the Phalanx of Ancient Greece, would very soon become a rope of sand. The secret of success is having leaders who can lead, and followers who will follow. For lack of this many causes, good and bad, have been defeated. Quantrell could lead, and he would be followed. Wild and lawless as were these terrible robber-bands, they were loyal and obedient to the law that ruled the camp. The terrible black banner, made and presented by Annie Fickle, and borne by Jim Little through so many daring escapades, was the in hoc signo of their dread warfare. But terrible as was the sign and dark as were its folds, it was but a feeble sign compared with the terrific character of the oath by which each candidate for guerrilla warfare bound himself. If oaths could bind, surely this oath of Quantrell's was binding. It was a pledge and declaration of purposes so dire and dreadful, that one's blood chills at the reading of it; and the men who voluntarily made it amid awful surroundings needed to be men of determined depravity

It was never administered except when the light of day had faded and the black pall of night had fallen on Nature's fair scenes, then this oath was to be made, and made in the presence of witnesses who were armed to the teeth; and in order that it may be clearly understood what manner of men these guerrillas undertook to be, the grimoath, of which Quantrell was the author, is inserted here. The candidate for lawless perils and distinctions, having expressed his ambition to join the ranks of the dreaded Quantrell, was made to swear this oath beneath the darkened heavens and in the solemn silence of the night :

“In the name of God and Devil, the one to punish and the other to reward. and by the powers of light and darkness, good and evil, here, under the black arch of heaven's avenging symbol, I pledge and consecrate my heart, my brain, my body, and my limbs, and swear by all the powers of hell and heaven to devote my life to obedience to my superiors; that no danger or peril shall deter me from executing their orders; that I will exert every possible means in my power for the extermination of Federals, Jayhawkers, and their abettors; that in fighting those whose serpent trail has winnowed the fair fields and possessions of our allies and sympathizers, I will show no mercy, but strike, with an avenging arm, so long as breath remains.

"I further pledge my heart, my brain, my body, and my limbs, never to betray a comrade; that I will submit to all the tortures cunning mankind can inflict, and suffer the most horrible death, rather than reveal a single secret of this organization, or a single word of this, my oath.

"I further pledge my heart, my brain, my body, and my limbs, never to forsake a comrade when there is hope, even at the risk of great peril, of saving him from falling into the hands of our enemies; that I will sustain Quantrell's guerrillas with my might and defend them with my blood, and, if need be, die with them; in every extremity I will never withhold my aid, nor abandon the cause with which I now cast my fortunes, my honor and my life. Before violating a single clause or implied pledge of this obligation, I will pray to an avenging God and an unmerciful devil to tear out my heart and roast it over the flames of sulphur; that my head may be split open and my brains scattered over the earth; that my body may be ripped up and my bowels torn out and fed to carrion birds; that each of my limbs may be broken with stones, and then cut off, by inches, that they may feed the foulest birds of the air; and lastly, may my soul be given unto torment, that it may be submerged in melted metal and be stifled by the fumes of hell, and may this punishment be meted out to me through all eternity, in the name of God and devil. Amen."

At the conclusion of the oath, the candidate was turned successively to the east, west, north and south, while four men, clothed in red and black suits, and wearing hideous masks, representing the devil, drew their long, keen swords and presented them at the newly-made guerrilla, one pointing at his heart, another at the head, another at the abdomen and the other shifting his weapon from the arms and feet.

Bound by such an oath and installed by such a

CHAPTER VII.

RICHFIELD AND PLATTSBURG—FIENDS IN WESTERN MISSOURI—RAID ON RICHFIELD—FRANK JAMES A
SAMUELS—PLATTSBURG CAPTURED—THE SPOILS OF WAR.

To some extent at least it must be conceded that Frank and Jesse James were the product of their times. The fierce passions roused by the dreadful conflict between North and South, were sowing seeds of bitterness and strife amongst those who had been for many long years firm, fast friends. Sides were taken by the elders, and the young people soon followed the example, and these two brothers trained and nurtured by one whose strongest sympathies, as we have seen were for the Southern cause, a woman of strong controlling power, who left the impress of her character on all with whom she came in contact, influenced largely the future of her sons.

In these days it was all but impossible to occupy a neutral position. You must either be for the sunny South, or for the "Blood-thirsty over-reaching North," as Mrs. Samuels would have mildly expressed herself. Throughout the whole of the Counties of Platte, Clinton and Clay, the feeling was most intense. At last two-thirds of the people favored the Southern cause, and hated with a perfect hatred the sight of a Federal soldier in his uniform of blue. This feud spread far and wide. Old-time friends became implacable foes. Men who had everything in common, save this one question, were at daggers drawn. Father against son, brother against brother, friend against friend. Even the women entered into the controversy with most characteristic zeal, and instead of discussing domestic affairs, or wasting their breath on the frivolities that are supposed to form the staple of the talk of their sex, they became fierce politicians and talked long and loud, and like Desdemona wished that Heaven had made them men that they might go and fight. Of social intercourse there was none except amongst fierce partisans. Business was harrassed, church life was stagnant and well nigh dead. The whole framework of society was shaken to its foundations.

Frank and Jesse James, in many things most dissimilar, were one at least in boldness and intrepid daring. They were both with Quantrell's band, full-pledged guerrillas. But they had not joined this band to be idle and content themselves with listening to stories of valorous deeds. They were anxious for the fray; and right glad were they when they were summoned by their leader to serious action.

The town of Richfield on the northern side of the Missouri river was garrisoned by Federal soldiers. The company was but small, comprising only thirty militiamen, commanded by Captain Sessions. Quantrell detailed twelve of his followers under the leadership of Captain Scott to make a raid on the garrison of Richfield. Frank and Jesse James were of the number; Frank leading the attacking party. There was a desperate fight. But the guerrillas were celebrated for their unerring aim, and at the first volley from the guns of the outlaws, Captain Sessions and Lieut. Graffenstein fell dead. Ten of the militiamen were killed, but Scott did not lose a man, nor was one of them wounded. This raid was a complete victory for the guerrillas. The garrison was surrendered to Captain Scott and the survivors were paroled.

This fray was practically the throwing down of the gage of battle to the Federal troops located in western Missouri, and the immediate result was of course that the Federals began to mass themselves for defence. But they did not understand the importance of keeping their plans profoundly secret, or there were some uncommonly active spies in their camp.

After the Richfield fight, which took place in the morning, Scott moved away into Clay County, but Frank James was appointed as a Scout. He rode through the thick darkness of that night, many a weary mile, until at last in the early hours of the morning, just as the moon broke through the gloomy clouds, he reached the home of his mother. That indomitable woman welcomed her son, but not with the hope that he would return to the peaceful pursuits of life. She was proud of her fearless boy; and now she had important tidings that must be borne at once to Captain Scott, or sent to Quantrell's quarters. The Federals were roused, they were determined to put an end to this wild warfare of the guerillas. The hunt was up, but the foxes were more wary than the huntsmen knew. The garrison of Plattsburg, in the County Town of Clinton, was left practically undefended, the defenders being out in search of the free-booters. The information Mrs. Samuels had given her son was of the highest importance. Before the moon had set and just as day was dawning on the mountain tops, Frank was in his saddle again and on his way to Scott. Scott heard the tidings, the opportunity was too good to be lost. What greater satire than to surprise Plattsburg while its gallant defenders pursued their fruitless search. There was no time to be lost. These were the days when speedy action, followed quick, on quick resolves.

Silently and secretly Scott's little band broke up camp about the second midnight after the Richfield raid. They rode within about four miles of Plattsburg, on Smith's Fork of the Grand river. They rested in a dense wood and slept for a few hours. Scouts were sent out to ascertain the situation of affairs. On their return a little before three o'clock in the afternoon the raiders mounted horses and pushed on with all speed to the Market square at Plattsburg. There were a few militiamen left in the Court-house. They were taken by utter surprise, but were not disposed to yield without a struggle. In the midst of the excitement Captain Rodgers the Federal commander of the garrison rode into the square, but before he could rejoin his men he was taken prisoner by Frank James. At sight of this a fierce struggle ensued. The Federal soldiers pouring out all the fire they could in the direction of the guerillas. For a time the issue seemed to be very doubtful. Frank James perceiving the gravity of the situation shouted to Captain Scott: "Captain, shoot that man, unless he gives up the Court-house."

With a great oath Scott swore he would, at the same time showing his loaded revolver.

Captain Rodgers yielded at discretion. The garrison was in the hands of Scott's little band. Two hundred muskets were captured and destroyed. The citizens had fled in the most abject fear. Scott's followers began their work of pillage, $12,000 in Missouri "Union Defence Warrants" were taken beside a large quantity of clothing. The spoils of war were divided. Frank James' share amounting to $1000. This was the first money that crossed his palm as a guerrilla. The day closed strangely after a grotesque fashion. The Federal prisoners were paroled, the principal hotel keeper was ordered to prepare a banquet with all speed. The Federal commander and his comrades—all prisoners—were present and shared the feast. Everything went merry as a marriage ball. There was not the slightest sign of resistance on the part of the affrighted citizens. At about nine o'clock at night these roys-tering dare devils took horse and spurred away through the darkness back to Quantrells camp.

A CARNIVAL OF MURDER.

RELL'S SPEECH!—ON TO LAWRENCE!
—A DAY OF DOOM!—FRANK AND JESSE KILL SIXTY-FIVE MEN BETWEEN THEM—A PER-ILOUS RETREAT.

It was a strong point with the sagacious Quantrell never to keep camp very long in the same district. Whatever might seem to be the guarantees of safety, he always deemed it safest to be moving about. So after the raiding of Plattsburg Quantrell ordered the camp to be broken up and pitched to southward. In this region a most deplorable state of things existed. The residents suffered exceedingly from the pitiless sack and pillage of both Federal and Confederate soldiers. And as of old, what the palmer-worm left the locust devoured; so, what the regular soldiery left the guerrillas most remorselessly appropriated. The James brothers were now warm ing to their work. The crack of the pistol and the flash of the bowie knife might be heard and seen any and every day. There was no day without its victims. Peace and law and order gave place to the most demoralized and dangerous condition of things. No man's life was safe. The possession of property, and especially of money was a man's passport to a bloody grave. Yet no one interfered. Even the militia seemed by common consent to let Quantrell and his followers have their way wholly undisturbed. True, whenever they attacked the guerrillas they were most woefully defeated. So that they grew weary of fighting losing battles.

But Quantrell and his blood-thirsty horde were tired of these small frays and longed for some grand assault. On a lovely summer night, August 18th, 1863, the guerillas were gathered round their camp-fire, when their leader sought a conference with a few of the bolder and more daring spirits. The heroes of these pages, Frank and Jesse James--the Younger brothers, the Shepherd brothers and two or three others were summoned to the council. It was resolved that Lawrence, a thrifty little town on the river Kaw, in Kansas, should be the scene of their next desperate exploits. Quantrell's pent-up hate against Gen. Jim Lane, who resided in Lawrence, determined him in this course. The council fell in with Quantrell's resolve. The sturdy, fearless chief did not seek for a moment to underestimate the perilous character of the undertaking. It would be hard fighting; there would be countless obstacles in the way, and many would be left on the prairies to fester in the sun. His chosen advisers, nothing daunted, joined most enthusiastically in the scheme; whereupon Quantrell called his followers to arms and made them this remarkable speech :

“ FELLOW SOLDIERS: A consultation just held with several of my comrades has resulted in a decision that we break camp to-morrow and take up a line of march for Lawrence, Kansas; that we attack that town, and if pressed too hard, lay it in ashes. This undertaking, let me assure you, is hazardous in the extreme. The territory through which we must pass is full of enemies, and the entire way will be beset by well-armed men through whom it will be necessary for us to carve our way. I know full well that there is not a man in my command who fears a foe; that no braver force ever existed than it is my honor to lead; but you have never encountered danger such as we will have to meet on our way to Lawrence; therefore let me say to you, without doubting in the least your heroism, if there are any in my command who would prefer not to stake their lives in such a dangerous attempt let, them step outside the ranks !”

For a moment after this speech there was silence; no sound was heard save the sighing of the night winds through the pines and the crackling of the camp-fire, when all at once a great shout burst from the followers of the intrepid chief, and the cry from every lip was: “ On to Lawrence !” There was but one desire, to strike Gen. Lane in his stronghold and lay waste the city on the Kaw. At break of day on the 19th of August the order was given to “mount,” and under the black banner of death the guerrillas, two hundred strong, followed Quantrell to the bloody fray !

The history of the next few days is one of barbarous cruelty. At Aubray, a small town on the border line of Kansas, Quantrell compelled three men whom he saw sitting at a store to become guides. There was nothing for it but to obey. After faithful service, bringing the whole force safely and expeditiously to Cole creek, eight miles from Lawrence, the ruthless leader ordered these men to be shot, on the principle, probably, that dead men tell no tales. Frank and Jesse James were charged to execute the diabolical command. They took the men into a wood and shot them down like dogs. One was an old man who pleaded hard for life; begged and prayed and implored; reminding these cruel men that he had done them good service and no harm. But a bullet went crashing through the old man's brain and stopped his praying, and the young murderers went merrily on!

It was a beautiful morning the 21st of August, 1863; the sun broke in beauty over the undulating prairie. Men and women were going forth to toil, and children were waking up to play. Suddenly a wild cry was heard, up went the black banner, and with a yell like wild Indians the marauders dashed into Lawrence. The unoffending residents took alarm. Volley after volley was fired. The people saw the dark ensign of the grave and knew that the guerrillas were upon them. They made no resistance; they felt resistance was vain. Quantrell's bloody hordes had already won the name of "irresistible!" Men sank down without a groan, shot dead! Women fled through the streets only to fall dead before the bullets of these incarnate devils. The streets literally ran with human blood.

In this wild pandemonium Frank and Jesse James held conspicuous places. Here, there, and everywhere, pistol in hand, they were to be seen. They were cold-blooded and deliberate through all that carnival of bloodshed; their pistols never missed fire; their bullets never missed their aim. They made a brutal boast that between them they killed sixty-five that awful day; Jesse his thirty, and Frank his thirty-five!

The prime object of this sortie, as has been already said, was to lay a strong hand on Gen. Jim Lane who, with his relentless Jayhawkers, had burned and sacked the town of Osceola, Mo. Lane lived in Lawrence, but the moment he heard that the followers of Quantrell were at hand he fled like a dastard and a coward and hid himself in a corn-field. The guerrillas, foiled and maddened by being cheated of their chief prey, shot down every man who came within the range of their revolvers. Quantrell's orders were to shoot down every man, but to spare the women and the children. Many women and children, however, were shot, and others met a more horrible death; for the murderers became incendiaries, and, with flame and torch, set the beautiful city of Lawrence on fire. The groans of the dying mingled with the shrieks of the burning, and house and home fell a prey to the devouring flames. The guerrillas became demoralized; they broke open saloons and stores and soon became a mob of howling, drunken devils. The holocaust of murder and rapine lasted all day; and when the night closed on the ghastly harvest of hell, the city of Lawrence was swept wholly from the face of the earth.

Quantrell and his men beat a hasty retreat. Their journey back to Missouri was more perilous than the day of slaughter. The Kansas militia and the Federal troops massed and pursued the flying murderers. But, though they were fully seven thousand strong, Quantrell's troops escaped. Their names had become so terrible that it took men of no ordinary boldness to face them. It takes a brave man to face the devil; and surely there was more of the demon than the human in these men. After many hair-breadth escapes they reached the coverts of Jackson and Clay Counties, where they were comparatively safe. Their total loss was only twenty-one men. None of the leaders had fallen. Frank and Jesse James bore charmed lives through all the dreadful carnage. They had received no wound or scar. Reserved as it would seem for darker and more desperate deeds.

A month of comparative leisure followed the dreadful massacre of Lawrence, during which time Frank and Jesse James found opportunities, though not without considerable peril, of visiting their home. These visits were most welcome to Mrs. Samuels, who took a strange and weird delight in the wild work of her sons. Instead of urging them to turn away from such a life of wreckless daring, she the rather fed the fires of their lawless ambition.

The weeks of leisure fled quickly past. At last Quantrell's cry was heard. The trumpet called to arms! and the James boys were ready for the fray.

Quantrell, like a sagacious General, had been most carefully considering the condition of the forces under his command, and if nothing could be done, to render them a still greater terror to all law-abiding people. So after considerable thought he had resolved to reorganize his little army. The command was to be divided into squads of twenty or thirty, by which means bold and unexpected dashes could be made at various points at the same moment. By this means their foes would be confused and bewildered, and pursuit would be rendered vain; and if disaster fell upon one or more of the squads that would be better than the destruction of the whole force. For a time this method was eminently successful. The Federal soldiers and the Union citizens were wholly unprepared for any such movement, and it did not cost superstitious people much of an effort to believe that these guerrillas were really in league with the devil. Quantrell seemed to them to be almost omnipresent. He seemed to be able to move his troops in the twinkling of an eye; and he and his wild following became more and more a dread and terror through all Western Missouri.

Jesse James was appointed to the command of a squad of twenty-five men. He became aware—probably through information received from his mother—of the movements of a company of Federal Cavalry under the command of Captain Ransom. The Federal soldiers were marching toward a place called Pleasant Hill. They were marching leisurely along past a dense wood, when all in a moment a rain of bullets fell upon them from the wood, and men fell dead from their horses as leaves fall in an Autumn gale; so fatal was the fire and so unerring the aim of their unseen foes. The whole company of the Cavalry was thrown into the most dreadful consternation. Jesse James seeing the advantage, ordered his squad to dash into the confused and stricken ranks, and without one thought of mercy the wild work was done. The havoc was terrible. Less than thirty out of the hundred of Captain Ransom's Cavalry lived to tell the story of that savage onslaught; while, strange to say, the loss of the guerrillas was only one killed and one wounded. It is said that Frank fought under his younger brother's lead in this conflict, and that Jesse killed seven men and Frank eight on this bloody day.

A week later Frank and Jesse, with fifty guerrillas in command, suddenly appeared in Bourbon County, in Kansas, five miles from Fort Scott. Captain Blunt commanded a company of seventy-five mounted Infantry. Blunt and his body guard were marching peacefully along, when like a flash of lightning the guerrillas opened fire and poured the leaden hail into the unsuspecting troops. A wild yell of triumph broke from Frank and Jesse as they saw, one after another, the soldiers of the Union falling dead from their horses without time for a dying groan! Again the bullets rang from their unerring revolvers, and forty out of the seventy-five lay dead, their unburied bodies soddened in the Autumn rains; while the victors rode back to bear the tidings to Quantrell and the camp.

We next find the brothers following in a squad commanded by George Todd. A fierce and bloody conflict took place. Todd and his men attacked a company of the Second Colorado Cavalry, under the command of Captain Wagner. This was a conflict in down-right earnest. Wagner was as brave a soldier as ever buckled on a sword, and if he died he meant to sell his life as dearly as he could. The guerillas were having it all their own way, and it was high time some check was put to their terrible ravages. The fight began and it was terrible! Todd made a furious onslaught, but he was met by unusual resistance on the part of Wagner's command. It came to a hand-to-hand fight; the rattle of revolvers giving place to the clash of swords. Jesse James fought like a tiger robbed of her whelps, and taking advantage of an opportune moment he spurred his horse and sent a bullet crashing through the heart of the gallant Captain Wagner. The company became demoralized at the loss of their leader, and they soon began to retreat in wild confusion. The wounded who were unable to fly, and who called for quarter, called in vain; the only sign of mercy shown them was that they were shot, or put to death by the sword, while their bodies were left to rot unburied. On the 12th of August Frank and Jesse shot seven Federal soldiers dead, at Perry County, Missouri.

The Federal forces were now being massed at Harrisonville. To ascertain their exact position and number was the perilous task assigned to Frank James. The greater the peril the greater the honor was a cardinal doctrine in the code of guerrilla warfare. Frank rode straight for the town, and neither drew spur or rein till he had come within sight of the picket lines. He fastened his horse to a forest tree and under the cover of the darkness managed to creep through the lines. He found a negro from whom he gathered all the information he wished to obtain, and then as stealthily crept back and mounted his horse. At this point, however, he was espied by two of the guard, who called to him to halt. His answer was from his revolvers; one shot went through the brain of one, the second guard was mortally wounded. Having given these murderous replies, and having roused the Federal camp to stumble in the darkness over the dead bodies of the guard, Frank rode back to Quantrell's camp with his information.

On the 16th of August, 1864, two days after Frank's adventure with the picket guards of the Harrisonville Federal militia, an attack was made on the Garrison at Harrisonville, but the regulars, forewarned by the events of Frank's visit, were ready for their lawless assailants. The guerrillas were compelled to retire; and this was to them most humiliating. They heard, however, of a band of Federal volunteers, who were encamped on Grand River, at Flat Rock Ford. Thither they bent their steps, only again to be defeated. In this fight Jesse James—who seemed to have borne hitherto a charmed life—was seriously wounded. A musket ball passed through his breast, tearing away a large portion of his left lung, and knocking him from his horse. He fell as if dead, and but for the bravery and fidelity of his companions would have been made a prisoner of war; and probably the world would have heard no more of Jesse James. But these guerrillas were bound by an awful treachery to stand by each other in the hour of peril, and Arch Clements and John Janette rode back through a terrible rain of bullets and rescued their fallen comrade. He was taken to the house of Capt. John A. M. Rudd, where for many days his death was hourly expected. Jesse himself anticipated fatal results, but this fact awoke in him no terrors. He determined to be as fearless in death as he had been dauntless in life. He took from his finger a diamond ring, which he charged Frank to give to their sister Susie, and to her he sent this dying message:

“I have no regret. I’ve done what I thought was right. I die contented.” Happy would it have been for himself, and for society, and for the fair fame of humanity, if the pitcher had been broken at the fountain; but Jesse James was reserved for darker deeds. By the 7th of September he had so far recovered as to be ready to travel and fight again. On the 16th of the month on the way to visit his mother, he shot three militia men dead at Keytesville, Chariton, Missouri, who questioned the right of way with him. On the 17th he rode twenty-nine miles to give Todd tidings concerning the movements of the Federal forces.

On the 20th of September the whole of Quantrell's band made a concerted attack on Fayette, Missouri. All the leaders were there ; Quantrell and Anderson ; Poole and Clements and Todd. Charge after charge was made, but all in vain. The Federals hurled the guerrillas back with unexampled force. Every charge of the Federals left a trail of dead or wounded outlaws. It was without question one of the severest repulses they had ever met. In the melee, Lec McMurtry, one of the bravest of Anderson's men, was dreadfully wounded right under the Federal parapets. In the face of the blazing muzzles of the foeman's guns, Jesse James marched to drag away his wounded friend. The hail of leaden bullets whizzed and rattled round him, but he escaped unscathed. He bore a charmed life. His brave and gallant deed is the only one redeeming feature of that complete defeat at Fayette.

CHAPTER X.

MORE DIREFUL DEEDS.

A GHASTLY MOONLIGHT SCENE—SIEGE OF A BAGNIO—
ONE DEED OF MERCY—CENTRALIA — FRANK ADDS EIGHT TO HIS DEATH-ROLL — MURDER OF BANES—JESSE WOUNDED—TODD DIES
—QUANTRELL'S BAND BROKEN UP.

One moonlight night Frank and five others of the band were detailed to lay siege to a notorious bagnio four miles east of Wellington in Lafayette county. This house of debauchery was constantly frequented by a number of Federal Militia men. Frank had charge of the sortie, and went a little ahead of his company to reconnoitre. He crept stealthily up to the house and through the chinks of the window saw the whole place full of Federal soldiers and lewd women. There were eleven men and eleven women. Their shameful festival was at its height. The women were nearly nude, and the whole company assumed every conceivable form of voluptuous grouping. They had been drinking hard. The songs were loud and lewd. The fun grew fast and furious. They were taking their fill of such delights as the bagnio offered, when suddenly a wild, unearthly yell startled them from their midnight debauch. A craven terror possessed them, the men and women alike grew instantly sober, for they knew the meaning of that wild cry. They knew the guerrillas were upon them. Frank James summoned the men at once to leave the house, promising safety to the women. As the soldiers came to the yard, a rain of bullets was poured upon them and ten of the eleven fell dead before having time for a moment's parley. But where was the eleventh man? A search was made. But no man could be found. At last Frank found there were twelve instead of eleven women. A more vigorous search was instituted which resulted in the discovery that one of the men, young and fair, an evident favorite at the bagnio, had been as quick as thought, attired in woman's clothes. Frank James discovered the man, he had blue eyes and a handsome face and would easily, at a distance and in woman's clothes, pass for a woman. Of course he expected to die there and then. His ten companions lay out in the yard, with their dead faces upturned to the beauty of the solemn moonlight. It was a ghastly scene. The women wailed in anguish and pleaded for the unmurdered boy. "He was so young to die!" they said. "And were they not content with the slaughtered ten?" "Here, Frank, take him," said the ringleader of the band. "You discovered him; he is your's to deal with."

“Come along,” said Frank, “and be shot.” The poor lad trembled in every limb and scarcely could follow the lead of the cold-blooded murderer of his dead comrades. They went out of the yard past the ghastly heap of the dead men, out into an adjacent thicket. “Here, boy, we are far enough,” said Frank James, as they reached a lofty tree that looked spectral in the starlight. The poor boy fell to the earth and began to plead, “Oh, spare me for my poor old mother’s sake,” he pleaded. “I never did you any harm. I would not mind dying in battle, but to die in such a way! It would break my mother’s heart!” The blue-eyed soldier boy was spared for his mother’s sake. “You are free, boy,” said Frank, firing his pistol in the air. The boy escaped through the darkness. This one deed of mercy Frank kept to himself. He did not reveal that he was ever weak enough to be moved by a suppliant’s plea. “Quick work, Frank,” said one of his comrades as he returned to them. “Yes,” said Frank, “babies don’t take much killing. No need to waste two shots on a boy!”

One quiet evening, during this eventful summer, Jesse James and Arch Clements were riding along without particular thought of slaughter, when they suddenly espied four militia men in an orchard, gathering apples. Two of them were in one tree and two in another. Without pause, without a word of parley, these guerrillas drew their revolvers and shot the four men dead, and then pursued their journey with scarce a break in the conversation.

The 27th of September 1864 was a day amongst the saddest and most awful of these Missourian records. Quantrells power was slipping into the hands of Bill Anderson,—as wild a Tiger as ever thirsted for blood. There was no deed too daring for him to undertake, no scheme too merciless for his dark soul to revel in. He was described as “the most savage guerrilla that ever trod the soil of Missouri.” He had resolved on a desperate massacre at Centralia, a village in the northeastern part of the county of Boone, on the line of the St. Louis, Kansas City and Northern Railroad. It was a beautiful morning this fatal 27th of September. One of those mornings when Summer seems to be wooing the Autumn, the peaceful Centralians little dreamed of that day’s disasters, albeit they were somewhat alarmed when they saw a company of men a hundred and fifty strong marching toward the quiet village; but when they saw the black flag unfolded, they knew that danger and death were not far behind and their hearts sunk within them. They never dreamed for a moment of resistance. The terror these guerrillas had inspired was perfect and was often half and sometimes a whole victory for them. They pillaged every house, and then Anderson ordered his murderous troops to form in line in front of the Railway depot, of which they took possession. They had not waited long when a train came along with five passenger cars well-filled with soldiers and citizens. A few shots were fired and then they boarded the cars. Every one of the passengers was ordered out and made to form in line. The thirty-eight soldiers were separated from the civilians and all disarmed. Then came a breathless awful pause. Bill Anderson was holding a moment's conversation with Frank and Jesse James; a signal was given, a wild yell was raised, the soldiers were marched a little distance and every man of them shot dead! not a bullet missed its mark! The victim fell with the report of the pistol, groaned an awful groan, writhed a moment or two, gasped a half suffocating gasp, and then all was over!—Having wrought their fill upon the soldiery they then turned their attention to the passengers whom they robbed of all their valuables and then permitted them to proceed on their journey without further molestation

This hour of horrible butchery had hardly passed before Anderson and his gang found a pretty stiff piece of work cut out for them. They were not to carry on this kind of work without any interference whatever. In the afternoon of this day Major J. H. Johnson rode into Centralia at the head of a hundred Iowa volunteers—A dreadful conflict ensued. For a time it seemed as if the Iowans were doomed to suffer by the lawless murderers; but the intrepid George Todd, burst through the volunteer lines, and soon the wretched soldiers were scattered and shot down like wandering sheep. Jesse James set his mark upon the leader of the troops and when the fight was at its hottest, sent a bullet through the heart of Major Johnson; he threw up his hands groaned, and fell from his horse; there was a stiffen-ing form, a crimson streamlet flowing from as gallant a heart as ever beat, and that was all! It was all over with the troops, such as could escape did. The wounded were shot dead. And the dead were left stark and still and unburied on the blood-stained prairie. Of that hundred, not thirty returned to tell the tale of the massacre of Centralia. It was a day of horror; as the night came the guerrillas made merry and spent the hours in fiendish delight. Frank James boasting that he had taken eight lives that day.

About this time the James boys wrought another of their diabolical deeds. There was an old man named Banes known to be a pronounced uncompromising Union man. One night Frank and Jesse, pretending to be Colorado troopers, visited the old man who lived in a corner of Clay County, Mo. Their purpose was to obtain information concerning the movement of the Federal soldiers. Banes welcomed the boys most heartily, but the old man wore his heart too much on his sleeve to be safe. He opened his mind freely and poured all the abuse he could find language to pour on these murdering thieving guerillas. He was particularly rough on Mrs. Samuels. Indeed he blamed her more than he blamed her unconscionable sons, and went so far as to say that she was "the mother of two devils!" Frank and Jesse without a sign that a third party could understand resolved upon their course. They affected to agree with him, secured his confidence, and even persuaded him to accompany them in search of the young desperadoes. Banes got his gun and pistol, saddled his horse, and the three rode on for about a couple of miles, when suddenly Frank and Jesse turned upon the unsuspecting old man, told him who they were; without time for him to plead for mercy, they each fired. The old man fell dead from his horse and was left a ghastly corpse on the highway to affright the next passer by, while Frank and Jesse rode merrily on under the quiet unheeding stars.

The tide of fortune now began to turn against the guerrillas. The ranks had been considerably thinned of late, many a bold rider had entered the "Silent Land" as suddenly and as sadly as his victims had gone before. Gloom was mingled with the romance of the wild border life. In a fray not far from their camp on the banks of the Blackwater, Jesse James was wounded. A little later on the advance guard of the Federal Army under the lead of General Price brought havoc among the guerrillas. There were numerous conflicts and at every conflict bloodshed. In one of these skirmishes, George Todd was killed. The James Boys dug his grave amid the falling Autumn leaves, and as they looked their last on a face, they counted of all faces they had ever seen the most brave and noble, they pointed their pistols upward to the sky, and beneath the light of the sad September moon they swore to avenge his death.

The dim leaves of October 1864 began to fall, the summer of blood was ended. For Missouri never saw such a year of rapine and robbery and murder as that year 1864. Quantrell's band was broken up. Frank and Jesse now walk separate ways, but they are still ways of robbery and blood.

CHAPTER XI.

ON THE WAR-PATH WITH JESSE.

THE WAR-PATH WITH JESSE — JESSE FOLLOWS SHEPHERD INTO TEXAS—CAPT. GARS AND THE REV. W. P. GARDINERS ARE MURDERED — THE PIN INDIANS—JESSE'S WILD LEAP— A QUIET WINTER—IN MISSOURI AGAIN—BRUTAL MURDER OF JAMES HARKNESS—AL-LAN DUNCAN'S WOOD-CHOPPING STOPPED—JESSE WOUNDED AGAIN.

Quantrell's band was now dissolved. The graves at last opened their hungry mouths to receive some of those whose life and powers had been spent in sending others to an untimely grave. Many of the chiefs were dead. Victory sat no longer on the black banner. George Todd, to whom peril was an inspiration, was resting in his grave. John Porte, fearless and bold, was mouldering beneath the sod. Fernando Scott had led his last wild charge. Bill Anderson sold his life dearly. Kinney was dead. And in many fields, and in many gory graves lay those who if not worthy of high rank in this heraldry of cruel slaughter; had proved themselves to be fearless, bold and bloody. Missouri breathed more freely when it was known that Quantrell's Band was now a dreadful memory of the past.

Frank James went to Kentucky. But we will now pursue the steps of Jesse. In the Autumn of 1864, Jesse James with about forty or fifty other guerrillas under the lead of Lieutenant George Shepherd, started for Texas. Their way lay through perilous Indian territory. The utmost vigilance was needful. For if the guerrilla was wary, the Indian was cunning. And at any moment they would not have been surprised to hear the wild war whoop, which none but Indians can raise. All went well for a time. On the morning of November 22d Shepherd's band confronted a band of Union militia commanded by Capt. Emmett Goss. This band had won a great name for reckless daring, and Shepherd and his party followers knew that no child's play was before them. Goss was no carpet knight but had gained the reputation of being "a fighting man." He had but just returned from a wild raid in Arkansas. Goss and Shepherd met. And a terrible fight ensued. It was a case of "Greek meeting Greek." The guerrillas were successful. Jesse was proud of his day's bloody work. He singled out Captain Goss, rode at him furiously, fired twice in quick succession and Goss fell dead from his horse with one bullet through his brain and another through his heart. The Rev. N. P. Gardi ners the Captain of the Thirteenth Kansas Militia was the next to fall before Jesse's fire. He pleaded hard for life, the answer was a bullet and instant death.

The Cherokee Indians were favorable to the Union and bitterly opposed to the guerrillas. Two days after the murder of Goss and Gardiner, Jesse was riding alone along the bank of a stream when to his horror he heard the yell of a body of these Pin Indians. They were well armed and were regarded as unerring shots. There was only one thing to do and that was to retreat. Jesse turned his horse and fled. But they kept up the chase, and Jesse soon found the Indians gaining upon him. There was only prairie, prairie, prairie—not a thicket or wood for shelter. One only chance remained, ahead of him there was a high precipice, the only thing to do was to risk all on a leap. He was quick to determine, and like Dick Turpin of old in his flying leaps with Black Ben, he put spurs to his charger and risked all upon a single die. Fortunately there was a pool of deep water beneath, neither he nor his horse suffered by the leap; and the Indians not caring to follow, Jesse escaped and found his way back to Shepherd's camp.

The winter in Texas was spent very quietly. With the spring Shepherd and his followers turned their faces once more to Missouri. They had a good deal of trouble with the Indians on their return journey. But the Indians gained nothing by their interference. In April of 1865 Jesse James was in Benton County. There lived in this neighborhood a man named James Harkness, a Union militia man who made himself most obnoxious by his strong pronounced Northern tendencies. Jesse and two of his comrades captured the man, and while the two held Harkness,—he the while denouncing them and all their robber-brood in unmeasured terms—Jesse cut his throat from ear to ear, and threw him in a ditch to rot till the buzzards and the wolves found him out. The taste of blood had its effect. The inhuman tigers thirsted for more. They journed on to Kingsville, Johnson County, Mo., where an old Federal militia man lived named Allan Duncan. Jesse found him chopping wood, the old man prayed for mercy. But Jesse's revolver stopped the praying and the wood chopping in a very short space of time.

In this same Johnson County, Jesse had another very narrow escape. A number of guerrillas had surrendered along with certain Confederate troops in May 1865. But Jesse had nailed his colors to the mast and would not surrender. The guerrilla band now hardly numbered a score. One day a band of Federals fell upon these stubborn sons of plunder, they fired upon them and an awful conflict ensued. Jesse's horse was killed under him, he was wounded in the leg and fled as fast as he could to the shelter of the woods, He was pursued and shot through the lungs and left for dead. The wound was dreadful and for two days and nights the wretched boy lay in a raging fever. He crawled to a place where a man was plouging, who took charge of him and finally sent him to his brother, who had gone to Nebraska for a season. One touch of romance has to be recorded here. The man who gave Jesse James his all-but fatal wound was John E. Jones, Company E. Second Wisconsin Regiment of Cavalry. The two became acquainted afterwards and have been firm fast friends for years. Sic Vitæ Est.

CHAPTER XII.

QUANTRELL'S LAST COMMAND—JOURNEY INTO KENTUCKY—COWARDICE AND VALOR AT HOPKINSVILLE—FRANK SHOTS CAPTAIN FRANK BARNETTE—FEDERAL TROOPS EXTERMINATED—QUANTRELL'S LAST FIGHT—THE GUERRILLAS SURRENDER.

We have followed the fortunes of Jesse James in his experiences in Texas as a follower of George Shepherd in the autumn of 1864 and the spring of 1865.

We must now retrace our steps and call attention, briefly, to the exploits of the elder brother, Frank. On the 4th of December, 1864, Quantrell gathered his last command about him, and started on his last pilgrimage of butchery. The old fire was dying down, and the fearless bandit of the hills was but a shadow of his former self. But if the old tiger is less lithe and active its growl is just as savage and its taste for blood as keen. Many of Quantrell's most valiant and trusted comrades had died a death as awful as their lives had been remorseless and cruel. Quantrell gathered about him between thirty and forty guerrillas, and with Frank James as a sort of Lieutenant, the band started for Kentucky. The Confederate armies had retreated from Missouri, and Quantrell felt that Kentucky would afford a fairer field for his purposes than Missouri. So, in the very beginning of a hard winter they left Wigginton for Kentucky. They went in the teeth of difficulties of all sorts. Raiding and pillaging and murdering in the summer months—when the woods form a grateful shelter, and the brushwood serves for a bed, and the camp-fire gleams romantically—is one thing; but the pursuit of such a perilous career in the teeth of winter is another. And this was not all. The militiamen had sworn by every oath that was binding to have Quantrell's life. It was only a question of time. The dread warrior's days were numbered. It was with difficulty he and his followers succeeded in getting out of Missouri alive. They were pursued hard by Captain Curtis and his troops on to the Arkansas line, but there the trail was lost, and the desperadoes crossed into Kentucky. On New Year's Day, 1865, they crossed the Mississippi River at Pacific Place, about sixteen miles above Memphis. They marched on through Big Creek, Covington, Tabernack, Humboldt, Milan and on to Paris. From thence to Birmingham, pressing forward they crossed the Tennessee River and went through Canton and Cadiz to a place called Hopkinsville. Here they had an adventure of some interest. Stray shots by the way had resulted in one or two scattered murders per diem, but there had been nothing to satisfy the greed of a guerrilla.

Arrived at Hopkinsville they found a house in which twelve cavalymen were taking their leisure. But on the first token of their coming, nine out of the twelve military heroes manifested that discretion which is the better part of valor and made themselves non est inventus. But the remaining three determined to fight to the bitter end. It was a fight against great odds—three to thirty-five. Three, but poorly equipped soldiers against thirty-five merciless guerrillas ! The gallant three blockaded the house, and held out for hours answering back the challenge to surrender with such ammunition as they possessed. At last Frank James told them that if they did not surrender he should be compelled to burn their stronghold ; and it was not till the house was burning about their ears that these poor wretches, half scorched, half suffocated, rushed through the flames to meet instant death from the deliberate, well-aimed shots of their relentless foes. They took the twelve horses the soldiers had left, as spoils of war. So closed another day of robbery, fire and murder. The chief spirit of this fray was Frank James.

When Cardinal Richelieu found the lion's skin too short for him he tried the fox's. So Quantrell when force was limited summoned cunning to aid his cruelty. At Hartford, in Ohio County, he played the role of a Federal Captain and described his band as a Federal troop in hot pursuit of bloodthirsty guerrillas. So successfully was the deception carried out that he thoroughly imposed upon the credulity of Captain Frank Barnette, the Captain of a company of Kentucky Federal militiamen. Barnette and Quantrell became firm friends, and it was not long before Barnette was persuaded by the wily bandit to go on an expedition to hunt for Confederate guerrillas! Barnette and his company, little dreaming of the sad doom that awaited them, rode out

Into the gates of hell.”

Quantrell had given orders that every man would be assassinated. He had arranged the plan of slaughter. His men were to ride beside the Federal soldiers; he was at an opportune moment to draw his pocket-handkerchief carelessly from his pocket and throw it over his shoulder. That was to be the sign for slaughter—quick and complete. The unsuspecting Federals rode on; about five o'clock in the afternoon, just as the winter's sun was sinking behind the Western hills, they reached a stream of water at a ford. The fatal sign was given. Quick as thought Frank James sent a bullet through the gallant heart of Captain Barnette, who fell dead from his horse without a single groan, his blood curdling in the blue waters beneath. Every man shot his man, while Quantrell from a hollow tree watched with fiendish complacency the ruthless murder of the whole Federal troop.

It will not be surprising that this last dark deed of violence, in which the most shameless treachery played so large a part, awoke the ungovernable anger of the Federal soldiers whose compatriots in arms had been so mercilessly destroyed. They were determined to hunt Quantrell to the death; and they did not fail of their purpose. They drove the wild tiger of the black flag from lair to lair, from hiding-place to hiding-place; until at last within a few days after the dastardly outrage of Hartford, Major Bridgewater and Captain Farrell, with a large Federal following, confronted Quantrell and his band in their last stronghold. It was Quantrell's last fight. Strangely enough Frank James was not in this last fray; he had been away on a visit, and was not with his chieftain when he fell, for which he never forgave himself. The soldiers drove Quantrell and his now diminished band of guerrillas into a village called Smiley. Here, finding escape utterly impossible, being hemmed in on every side, Quantrell made his last stand. It was an awful fight, a fight intended to be one of utter extermination. There were three hundred against forty! Gashed and wounded and covered with blood and dust Quantrell fought on, till blinded with his own blood, riddled through and through with a score of bullets, he fell at last mortally wounded, with an empty pistol in one hand and a sword reeking with blood in the other.

He fell the scourge and curse of Missouri. It was an awful scene! When his comrades saw him fall they lost all heart. But the soldiers did not rest with the death of the leader of that murderous clan. The blood of their slaughtered comrades a few days before called for vengeance, and they killed every follower of Quantrell. It was that day a work of utter annihilation. Not a man was left alive. Frank James had to thank his accidental absence from that scene for his life. For if he had been there, a hundred guns would have flashed out on him the vengeance of the foe.

Quantrell, though mortally wounded, lingered for a little while. And before he died Frank James paid him a last visit. It is said that, hard of heart as Frank proved himself, he nevertheless wept like a child by Quantrell's dying bed, and upbraided himself for his absence from that dreadful fight; half inclined to hope that if he had been there, somehow the tide of battle would have turned. Quantrell's last words were his wisest. He advised that all the scattered members of the guerrilla forces should range themselves under Henry Porter's leadership, and now that the war was principally settled should surrender to the Federal authorities. This was done. And so ended with the ghastly death of its chief the sad page of guerrilla history.

CHAPTER XIII.

AFTER THE WAR MORE TROUBLE.

FRANK AT BRANDENBURG—ARRESTED AS A HORSE THIEF —BADLY WOUNDED—ROBBERY OF LIBERTY BANK
JESSE BESIEGED—DEAD MEN OUT IN THE SNOW.

Frank James gave his parole at Samuel's Depot, Nelson County, Kentucky, July 25th 1865. Yet he did not at once return to his native State. His part in the terrible tragedy of Centralia was not forgotten, and on that account he was still among the proscribed. He was in point of fact an exile from Missouri, and for some time he lingered in Kentucky. How long he would have continued there a peaceful law-abiding citizen if all things had gone well, it is hard to tell. Had he not grown weary of that sad unrestful life? or did the awful passion that had so long been fed on slaughter and blood cry aloud for further gratification? Once pledged to such a life as he had tried, could he easily reconcile himself to the dull monotony of a peaceful life? Circumstances helped largely to determine the question.

At last the war ended. The strife and carnage that had cost so big a price in money and in men ceased, and men returned to their old order of life. But it was very speedily found that that order could only be resumed by slow processes. Four years on the battle-field and by the camp-fire had unfitted men to a very great extent for the pursuits of former days. This is one of the untabulated results of glorious war. But the war had left a darker legacy especially to the Border States. A horde of barbarous ghouls in human form had followed ever upon the skirts of the army; too lazy to work, too cowardly to fight, they fattened upon the blood and sorrow of the times. They followed the army at a safe distance, and made a living by robbing and plundering with sacrilegious hand the unoffending and valiant dead. The guerillas were worthy only of severest and unmeasured condemnation. But these birds of prey were worthy only of every honest man's supreme contempt. The war was over and the despicable means of their living gone, they took to theft and robbery and became the thugs and highwaymen of the time. Their special weakness was horse-stealing, and all along the borders of Kansas, Missouri and Kentucky, farmers and stock raisers suffered exceedingly.

It was just at this time that Frank James was passing from Nelson County, to Brandenburg in Meade County on the Ohio river. He was not aware that Brandenburg was the favored rendezvous of horse thieves, nor that a very large number of valuable horses had just been stolen from La Rue. Such however was the case. The people were up in arms against the thieves, and a number of disbanded Federals were now busy chasing these idle robbers. Frank James alike ignorant and innocent rode leisurely into Brandenburg and sought the quiet of the hotel. He was sitting quietly in the hotel without the slightest dream of trouble, when a posse of four men, with a magnificent giant of a man at their head entered. Whether they had been informed that Frank James the noted guerrilla was at the inn is not known. The leader of the company laid his hand on Frank's shoulder and said mildly and half pleasantly:

"I arrest you as a horse thief!"

Frank took in the whole situation in a moment. But moved no muscle, betrayed no sign. He of course was not unarmed. The leader of the four saw only in his prisoner a young fellow of two and twenty, a little bronzed and travel-stained; there was nothing to alarm him in the clear gaze of young Frank.

"You will consider yourself under arrest," added the speaker.

"I consider no such proposition," said Frank, and as he spoke his hands went to his belt and before the arresting party as much as noticed the movement, two of them lay at Frank's feet shot dead by his revolvers that never failed him, a third was writhing in mortal agony and the fourth was fleeing for his life. As he fled however he fired a parting shot, which nearly cost Frank his life. It made a terrible wound in his left hip, which rendered him almost unable to move. But his blood was roused. The old guerrilla spirit flamed up again. The wildest excitement ensued, there was instantly a crowd gathered round the hotel, and the forms of the men bespoke an angry purpose; but Frank ever dauntless crawled to a post near at hand; and though they cursed and threatened he ordered them on peril of their lives to stand back and they obeyed.

In the midst of all this excitement, some daring young spirit, who had known Frank in other days, dashed through the noisy crowd and half helped, half dragged Frank on to his horse and rode away with him, and not one of all the valiant Brandenburgers attempted for one moment to arrest or stay the departure, of this man who had wrought a triple murder in their sight.

Frank's preserver drove him away, to a safe hiding place and procured him the most skillful medical assistance. The ghastly wound brought him to the door of death, and whole weeks passed away before the doctor pronounced him out of danger. But months of suffering followed. Indeed years after, Frank declared that he felt the effects of the shot of "that damnable Brandenburger."

During his months of enforced quiet he brooded over his lot and felt that it was utterly vain for him to dream of any peaceful way of life! The die was cast. What was the odds? He had had good luck and bad luck. One thing was pretty clear to him, he would have to fight life out on the line he had voluntarily selected.

But concerning the younger brother, Jesse, how does he fare? We left him last suffering from a dangerous encounter in which he had been shot through his left lung. He is suffering still and is quietly resting in the family home at Kearney, Clay County, Missouri.

On the 14th of February, 1866, while Frank was in Kentucky, still suffering from his wound of the previous July, a great robbery took place at Liberty, Mo., that aroused the greatest excitement through all that western district. The Commercial Bank of Liberty was robbed of a sum of money close upon $70,000. The names of the James boys were immediately connected with the robbery. And yet there were many who loudly declaiming against them for their deeds of blood, still believed that they were honest men. Jesse had but recently returned from Nebraska and was still weak and suffering, and could hardly have had any direct hand in the robbery. Still the almost universal opinion was that he had planned the robbery. And, indeed, it was believed that a good share of the booty secured from the bank found its way to Frank and Jesse James. For it is clear that for a long time these brothers had had no means, legitimate, or otherwise of filling their purses. However this may be, a company of men, who were stinging from old wounds, determined to put an end to Jessie's deprivations by quietly handing him over to the civil power. And so four days after the bank robbery at Liberty, they matured their plans. They had no desire to kill Jesse, only to secure him and imprison him. Accordingly close on the hour of midnight of Feb. 18th, 1866, six well armed, well mounted militia men rode up to the home of Dr. Samuels. Jesse was suffering from a burning fever and was tossing from side to side when his quick ear detected the sounds of horse's hoofs crunching the crisp winter snow. In a moment he was on the alert. His two trusty companions—his revolvers—were under his pillow loaded. The heavy tramp of five men was soon heard coming along the piazza, and knocking at the door with the butt end of their guns, they demanded immediate admission.

Dr. Samuels gained a little time by parleying at the door, telling these midnight visitors to "be patient a moment, there was something wrong with the blamed lock." Meantime, Jesse looking through the window and taking in the whole situation, crawled down to the foot of the stairs.

"What shall I do?" whispered the doctor. "Open the door the moment I tell you," Jesse answered in a faint voice, looking carefully at his weapons of defense. The besiegers grew impatient, and amid muttered curses on the whole family, began to beat in the panels of the door with their guns, demanding that "that murdering thief, Jesse, should come and surrender at once." Declaring they would take him either dead or alive. Jesse was ready with the answer. But the answer they got was a fearful one.

The door opened, and, standing half hidden in the shadow of the doorway, Jesse fired with unerring precision, and two of the company fell instantly dead, staining the virgin snow with the crimson torrents of their heart's blood.

Standing now full in the doorway, the moonlight falling on his pale spectral face, he looked a perfect wraith of slaughter; and before the report of his first shots had fully died away, he fired again, and two more of the squad fell, writhing in agony and pain. The rest of that blustering blasphemous company fled to their horses and rode away in the moonlight, leaving behind them their dead and dying comrades. The wounded men were spared. But it was a solemn sight. The dead men with pallid faces gazing stony gazes, out of sightless eyes, at the radiant moon and patient stars, the pure white mantle of the snow, stained and bedabbled with their blood; while the silence of the night was broken by the discordant groans of the wounded! An hour ago all was quiet and still! These dead men were full of life, boastful roystering and merry. Their roystering is over now forever. It is quiet and still again! But it is the quietness of a sleep in which there is no dreaming and from which there is no awakening.

Weak and feeble as he was, Jesse was wide awake to his peril. The escaped soldiers would bear the tidings of the midnight slaughter to the people all around. It would be foolish to wait and try conclusions with a largely augmented force; so

Jesse, weak as he was, trembling from head to foot with fever, but not with fear, mounted his horse and rode rapidly away in the solemn light of the mellow moon.

The news of this last relentless massacre spread like wild fire. Wearied and worn with the frightful experiences of four years of Civil strife, the Missourians longed for peace. They did not stop to ask how this last fray at the Samuels' homestead commenced. Only the dreadful fact that Jesse had killed and wounded four out of six of these soldiers, and had driven the others away in dread alarm, was present to the minds of the people of the neighborhood. A spirit of grave and awful determination arose amongst them. Jesse James must die! There had been enough and more than enough of his wild depredations. Life was so insecure, with his fatal pistol always ready for dread service, that no one knew at what moment—without rhyme or reason—he might find himself the target of Jesse's unerring aim. Frank was absent. Where, they knew not, nor cared, so that he spared Missouri the shame and peril of his presence. But here was Jesse; and if of the two, one was more daring, more deliberate, more cold-blooded than the other, surely it was Jesse. The death-sentence of the younger of the James brothers was recorded in the fixed purpose of the men of Clay county; and, accordingly, a large crowd, fifty strong, well armed, sought the Kearney farm and demanded that Jesse should be delivered to them. They swore a solemn oath that they would take him, dead or alive, they cared not which. They had come to take him, and take him they would. But if they had been fifty thousand strong, instead of fifty, they could not have taken him, for the very simple reason that he had thought it prudent, all things considered, to retire to a more salubrious and less excited district.

Not long ago, a lawyer in one of the Western courts apologized for the inability of his client to attend the summons of the court. "Judge," said he, "I am very sorry my client cannot attend the court, but I have eighteen valid reasons to present for his non-attendance, each one of which, I am sure, will be a sufficient and valid excuse. If the court please I will proceed."

"Proceed," said the Judge.

"In the first place, your Honor," said the indefatigable lawyer, "I very much regret to say that my client is dead!"

"The worthy and learned Counsel need proceed no further," said the Judge; "the first reason satisfies the court, we will waive the other seventeen."

So the hunt was up for Jesse James, but it was all in vain. All the most solemn assertions of Dr. Samuels were regarded as so many subterfuges to gain him. The woods, the farms, the barns, the stables, all were searched, but searched in vain

"They could not find young Jesse,
For young Jesse was not there."

HAVE THE GAME."

FRANK AND JESSE IN KENTUCKY—THE HEROES OF THE HOUR—"NONE BUT THE BRAVE DESERVE THE FAIR"—WILL MURDERERS TURN ROBBERS?—
INACTION INTOLERABLE.

The tragedy at Brandenburg and this last fray of Jesse's did much to settle the future of the James Brothers. However much they might be disposed to return to a quiet life, circumstances seemed all against them. If they did not bear visibly the mark of Cain upon their foreheads, they were nevertheless marked, and noted and distrusted. They had dabbled too freely in human blood, they had been too utterly reckless in their wild exploits to win anything like confidence. Men and woman everywhere were as much afraid of them as they were ashamed of them. And the general belief was that these awful fires that burned in the hearts of the young bandits were by no means quenched. Only smothered for a time, and that at the very first excuse they would flame up again blood red. So it came to pass that anything that occurred of an unusually desperate character, was quietly and without much enquiry laid to the door of Frank and Jesse James. They had won such a reputation that nothing they could do was thought to be worse than they had done. So that horses are stolen at La Rue, or a bank is robbed at Liberty, then of course Frank is a horse-thief and Jesse is a bank-robber. And they are at once condemned in the public mind without judge or jury or any very long consideration. One need not wonder very much then that talking the whole matter over one day, Jesse ever the more talkative of the two, would break forth with this piece of fool's philosophy: "See Frank, its no use fighting against all this d——d prejudice, we've got the name anyhow, we might as well have the game and the name, as the name without the game."

"All right" said Frank in his usual surly manner, "go ahead and the devil take the hindermost."

The pistol shots at Lexington and Brandensburg had very seriously wounded both the robbers. Frank had to stay for some time with friends in Kentucky. After the eventful moonlight night at Kearney, Jesse made his way slowly and most stealthily to Nelson County, Kentucky. There he found Frank suffering intensely from the effects of his hip wound. He was scarcely able, even with the aid of a crutch, to walk more than half a mile without the most intense fatigue, while riding on horseback was altogether out of the question. Jesse's long and perilous ride from Kearney had been exceedingly trying. What with frequent hemorrhages of the lungs and a fever still raging, it is a wonder he reached Chaplin,—the place of his brother's retreat—alive. As the summer of 1867 went on, Jesse grew worse and worse. He determined to put himself under the best surgical care. For he who had been so reckless of the lives of others was chary of his own. In October, 1867, he went to Nashville, Tennessee, and put himself under the care of Dr. Paul F. Eve, a noted surgeon of that city. He was here for months, and many a time despaired of his life. It was not till early in the following year, 1868, that Jesse became thoroughly convalescent. He returned to Chaplin and rejoined Frank.

These brothers had many friends and relations in Kentucky; not a few of whom, notwithstanding they were outlaws, and justly so, still had a warm place in their hearts for the daring boys. Moreover, there were in Kentucky many of the earlier comrades of the stormy times, who would gladly share all they had with the suffering compatriots of Quantrell. There were many homes where, in the closing days of the war, Quantrell, Magruder, Marion, Sue Munde and others of the bold guerrillas were feasted in unbounded luxuriance. The Southern cause was lost, but Southern pride remained unbroken. Many of the Kentucky families had lost their noblest and best at the hands of the Federals, and they found some sort of grim revenge in giving home and welcome to these young men who had never once missed an opportunity of hurling death into the Northern ranks. Frank and Jesse were the heroes of the hour, and in the homes of the McClaskeys, and the Russels, and the Sayers, they were hailed as the most honored guests; and they did not lack the smiles of beauty, for fair and graceful ladies vied with each other in their constant attentions to the bold boys of the border. Hosts of fair Kentuckians, who during the war had become thoroughly interested in the issues at stake, and were such enthusiasts as to see nothing noble and nothing valorous save in the Confederate ranks, and those who aided the Southern cause, may be excused if they were ready with gentle hands to bind the bay leaves and the laurel crown, about the brows of those who had won the reputation of having killed more of the "accursed Federal foes" than any hundred soldiers in the fields of battle. Women generally dote on the military. A red coat is the heraldic sign of highest glory. Most of them, if invited to a military ball or heaven, would take their risks on heaven and accept the invitation to the ball; and so it came to pass that maidens and matrons of Kentucky bestowed their sweetest smiles and their compliments on the brave and daring troopers who had followed the fallen standard in irregular warfare, hurling death and defiance at the Federal hordes.

Summering in the smiles of these fair flatterers, Frank and Jesse would sometimes declare themselves overcome with gratitude, and protest that they were not worthy of these charming attentions, to which modest protest the fair ladies of Kentucky had ever the one answer:

“None but the brave deserve the fair.”

But the one question in many forms was present to the minds of Frank and Jesse, and if Frank spoke of it less frequently than Jesse it was not because he thought less of it. What was their future to be? The gateways of ordinary careers were closed against them; and beside all this, they began more and more to realize the terrible strain of inaction. Resting quietly upon your oars is all very well for a little time, but to an active, energetic mind enforced inaction is terrible to endure. What was to be done? The war was over, there was no military occupation for them. Besides, they were the followers of a fallen cause. Slowly, but surely, there dawned upon them the possible career of plunder. Should the murderers turn robbers? They never asked this question boldly and plainly, but in some shape or another, vaguely, but not less certainly, the question was pressing itself home upon them. Many of the friends of Jesse James, while they would not openly aver that he was concerned in the Liberty bank robbery, did not scruple to hint that some of the funds of that bank were sustaining both the brothers during their prolonged and perilous sickness. Should they start forth on a career of plunder? Up to this time their characters for honesty had never been impeached. Indeed, many of the bitterest foes of the James Brothers held them in a kind of respect. At least they had universal credit for these three points of character: All Missouri said that the James were: First, as true as steel to their friends and comrades; next, they were always courteous and respectful to women; and lastly, they were as honest as the day. Were they to throw away this last clause of character? Were the murderers to become robbers? That was the question.

ROBBING? — DESPERATE HUNT FOR THE RAIDERS — OLIVER SHEPHERD SHOT DEAD — FRANK AND JESSE OFF TO THE GOLDEN GATE.

What is to be done with the disbanded soldiers after the war? That question has been one of most difficult solution in all civilized lands in modern times. To gather great crowds of men to go out and fight the battles of a nation has never been so difficult as to know what to do with them when the war is over. And the longer the war lasts the more complicated and difficult the question becomes. There can be no doubt a prolonged engagement in the profession of arms utterly unfits men for the hum-drum and monotony of ordinary life. A feverish restlessness is begotten that experience proves is very hard to allay. To keep, as a permanent institution, a large standing army does very little, if anything, to mitigate the state of things; for in all the large towns and cities of Europe there seems to be a growing dislike to having these towns and cities turned into military centres. It is not only the voice of prudish sentiment, but the voice of repeated and undeniable facts, that declares a residence in a barracks town to be most undesirable. Put the thing in the most favorable light possible, it cannot but be a perilous experiment to hold great companies of single men in almost entire idleness; for though the adage is a child's adage, it is an adage for men and women as well as children:

"Satan finds some mischief still For idle hands to do."

America had her share of this difficulty at the close of the war. Both North and South felt the position keenly. Four years in the camp and the field, if they had not served to utterly demoralize the soldiery, had at least unfitted most of them for the farm and the factory and the store. But this was not the worst. As has been said before, there constantly hung about the skirts of both armies a most undesirable following of those who preferred pillage and plunder to either fighting or work. And, beside all these, there were scattered up and down the border States great numbers of those who in Quantrell's palmy days had followed the fortunes of guerrilla warfare.

In Tennessee, Arkansas, Missouri, and especially in Kentucky, where Frank and Jesse had so long found an asylum, there were many of the ex-guerrillas still living, and it only needed some little wind of circumstance to blow, and they were ready to turn back to the old exciting life of peril and romance. Indeed, they began to think there was nothing else before them. They were unfitted for a quiet life, and all the doors that opened to honest, peaceful avocations were closed against them, and guarded by prejudice and distrust. What was to be done? Dick Kinney had bequeathed his pistol to Frank James. On this pistol there were forty-eight notches, a ghastly record of those who had fallen victims to its deadly fire. It was treasured by Frank as a trophy and sometimes he thought that so faithful and true a weapon ought not to lie any longer in inglorious rest. The dumb and unused messenger of death rebuked his apathy and it needed but very little to wake the old guerrilla fire within him. To what extent Frank and Jesse and their friends had become organized is not known. For a time, at least, they were forming plans in secret. At last the Western world became aware that they had not been wholly inactive. The sense of security which was spreading throughout the country was most suddenly disturbed.

Russelville—the next scene of their exploits—is a pleasant little village of three to four thousand inhabitants. It is most pleasantly situated in Logan County, on the southern frontier—adjoining Tennessee. It is quite a centre of a large, thriving agricultural district. And its bank became in consequence the depository of a good deal of wealth. The spring time of 1868 was a favorable time for the farmers of that western region. The roads were in excellent condition, so that there was no difficulty in the carrying of produce to the markets. So the bank of Russelville was doing a thriving business, which fact was not unknown to those whose depredations are now to be recorded.

It was a beautiful spring morning, March 20th, 1868. There seemed nothing unusual in the sleepy old village with its long struggling street that spring morning, save as the sleepest of villages will bear the impress of a rarer beauty in the early days of spring. The music of the school bell had just ceased, to be taken up in ringing tones by the blacksmith's merry anvil. By twos and threes the women stood at their doors enjoying the usual morning gossip; the old men hobbled about and declared it as fine a spring as they had seen in "forty years;" and the radiant maiden looked still more radiant as she caught a sweet smile from the young clerk as he passed on his way to the store, and thought of that verse from the poet which he had quoted so touchingly last night:

"In the spring a livelier iris
Comes upon the burnished dove;
In the spring a young man's fancy
Gently turns to thoughts of love."

The stores were open and the store-dealers were beginning their business for the day. Now and then a rumbling wagon, corn laden creaked along the quiet street. The bank was just about to open its doors, when suddenly a clatter of hoofs was heard. Sharp, quick and terrible as the crash of doom, a dozen horsemen each armed with two pairs of revolvers dashed down the street to the terror and amazement of the quiet villagers. With the most fearful oaths and threatenings these armed brigands commanded the people to go into their houses and keep quiet on pain of instant death, and to confirm their purpose they fired in all directions. Two of the men, of whom there can be no reasonable doubt that Jesse James was one and Cole Younger the other, dismounted at the bank and entered. The cashier had opened the safe and the books were out on the counters, and a quantity of gold was spread out before the cashier which he was then in the act of counting. The sudden entrance of these armed men astonished him for a moment, he turned at once to the safe and was in the act of swinging back the door when Jesse James said:

“Leave that alone and keep quiet, or I’ll blow your brains out.”

What could the cashier do with such a threat in his ears, supported as it was by the loaded revolvers too close to said brains to be pleasant. The cashier setting a higher value on his life than all the gold in the safe kept quiet, and the safe was rifled, the loose gold on the counter was swept off by Cole Younger. Everything of value was taken away except a few revenue and postage stamps. These the robbers thought hardly worth the trouble of taking, and so Jesse, to whom a joke was never untimely, tossed back the stamps remarking to the affrighted cashier that he "might want to mail letters latter in the day!"

The booty secured the robbers departed as they came cursing and threatening instant death to any who dared to follow. They swept into Russelville like a tornado they swept out like a whirlwind! The surprised and stunned inhabitants were perfectly helpless against the wild daring of the adventurers. The completeness and simplicity of their plans, and above all the speed and promptitude with which those plans were executed, left the men and women of Russelville standing agaze at one another, ready almost to ask if those things had really transpired; or if they had some horrid nightmare! and they seemed as ill-fitted to pursue the robbers as they had been incapable of resisting the plunder. No one blamed the cashier of the bank. He was thoroughly helpless. The safe was open, and all he could have done would have been to throw away his life without saving a penny to the bank. The amount stolen has been variously estimated. But all told there could not have been much less than $100,000, which sum divided between ten men would make a pretty considerable fortune for each man.

The friends of the James boys have made very strenuous efforts to clear them of complicity in this deed of plunder. But however they may have succeeded in making out a case in defense of Frank, whom they declare to have been in Nelson County, Kentucky still suffering terribly from his wound;

they were not as successful in their defence of Jesse. Jesse himself attempted to prove an alibi. But if he had been at the Marshall House, Chaplin on the 18th of the month, there would have been no great difficulty in his reaching the scene of the robbery in ample time. For he rode only the fastest horses and as we have seen it was no uncommon thing for him to ride fifty miles on horseback in the space of six hours. There can be little doubt that the leaders of that raid were Jesse James, Cole Younger, Jim White, George and Oll. Shephard. And if Frank James had no active part in the robbery, he probably had his share, and a very good share in arranging and planning the whole affair.

After the first surprise of the daring robbery had passed away it was resolved to make a most determined and exhaustive pursuit. The robbery so bare faced and impudent was only one of many that would follow if this kind of thing was unchecked. The fact that murder had not been added to robbery was owing rather to the paralysis that struck the astounded villagers than to the mercy of the robbers, and now thoroughly aroused it was resolved to rid the region once and forever of these robber-bands.

The pursuit was long, untiring, but fruitless. The blood of the Kentuckians was up, but it was all in vain. They followed the scent with utmost care, but the foxes were always ahead! Over the Cumberland river, through the wild rocky region that leads to the border line of Tennessee, thence to the wide waters of the Mississippi, but all in vain! The robbers eluded their grasp! They had plunged into the trackless paths of Southeast Missouri. The pursuers took up the trail and pressed unweariedly through swamp and morass. The scent became fainter and fainter, till at last utterly worn out and dispirited they returned home, their expedition having utterly failed. George Shepherd, however, was subsequently arrested, he was convicted and sent to the penitentiary for a term of years.

Only one other member of that robber gang was ever found, and that was Oll Shepherd. He was found in Jackson County, Missouri. A warrant for arrest was issued, but Oll declared he would never be arrested. A body of from twelve to twenty men were detailed for his arrest. They surrounded him, well armed, and called out to him:

“Surrender, or die! Which shall it be? Will you surrender?”

“Never! Death before surrender, a thousand times! Do your worst!” shouted the valiant old guerrilla.

Then the awful work began, shots came thick and fast. It could only be a question of a little time, but Oll Shepherd fought to the last. He stood with his back to a tree and emptied his revolver, firing fourteen shots in wild despair. At last he reeled and staggered, but it was not till his body had received seven bullets that he fell; fell like the old Greek warrior fighting with death to the last!

Every other member of that robber-band that wrought such consternation in Russellville that bright spring morning, escaped.

The James boys parted company for a while, but they both set their faces toward the golden gate. They met in that "glorious climate of California," wither we next follow them and their shifting fortunes.

CHAPTER XVI.

OUT IN THE GOLDEN WEST!—JESSE SAILS FOR CALIFORNIA—FRANK JOURNEYS WEST-WARD—THE BROTHERS MEET—QUIET LIFE IN PASO ROBEL—PLEASANT DAYS IN THE SIERRAS—SHAKING UP THE ENCAMPMENT OF BATTLE MOUNTAIN—A FATAL GAME AND A FEARFUL NIGHT.

Shortly after the robbery of the Russelville bank, Jesse James was back again at Kearney in Clay County. Romantic stories are told of the marvelous manner in which he pioneered the robbers from Russelville through the hilly regions of Kentucky, never resting till he reached the banks of the Mississippi. That march of more than five hundred miles, made still longer by the many necessary detours, was full of hair-breadth 'scapes and perils, and the wonder is that the robbers were able so successfully to evade their pursuers. But Jesse's guerilla experience had made him as cunning in ambush, and as skilful as a guide, as he was brave in battle and dauntless in peril. The story of that one prolonged flight from Russelville to Missouri's western border is a complete romance in itself. The stolen marches under the cover of the starry night, the patient waiting in ambush while their pursuers were so near, that their breath seemed almost to blow hot upon their cheeks, the daring sallies when everything was staked upon a single chance. The conduct of Jesse James in that long ride for life would have made him a hero in any other cause, and those whom he piloted to safety thought him a real hero, whatever the world might say.

Jesse's physical endurance was something wonderful. He had received twice through the lungs bullets that had left great gaping wounds that would have been fatal to any ordinary man. He bore upon his body the scars of more than twenty wounds. And yet he was but in the very morning of his days! Not twenty-four! And yet he had gone through, and dared, and endured more than many a veteran through a long career of warlike experiences. He seemed to have been cast in an iron mould, but there were limitations to his strength, and his friends urged him to a time of quiet. Dr. Joseph Wood, of Kansas City, advised that he should take a sea voyage and seek some warmer climate where his shattered lung might have an opportunity of healing.

In accordance with this advice, he left the home of his childhood in the month of May, 1869, with many misgivings that he might never see it again.

And, though not overburdened with sentiment, we can well understand that he looked with a fond lingering look as he bade farewell—it might be forever—to the hills and vales of his native Missouri. It was the home of his childhood and youth. What there had been of gentleness in those bye-gone days was associated with these scenes. It had been moreover the theatre of many daring exploits and perilous adventures. There he and his brother Frank had won names that some counted heroic, while the great majority spoke only of them with dread and horror. For good or ill, for life or death, he was leaving his early home. And he left it with a sigh. He was badly wounded, and he was suffering enough to make him thoughtful. Besides, his very going away at all was a recognition of the fact that he was in a critical position.

He journeyed as far as New York, where he spent a few days with friends of the old stormy times, for the James boys had friends everywhere. On the 8th of June, 1869, he set sail for Panama on board the Santiago de Cuba. From Panama he took another ship, and at last, after a pleasant and helpful voyage, he reaches the "City of the Golden Gate."

In the meantime Frank had been hiding away in the house of a most respectable citizen in Nelson County, Kentucky. A few weeks after the Russellville fray, and when the excitement had quieted down, the friends of Frank deemed it best that he should absent himself from that region. He was still suffering from his wounded hip. And, as it is alleged, the funds of the Russelville bank had placed the boys in possession of a good round sum of money, there was no reason why they should not enjoy a good long spell of quiet. One dark night Frank was driven in a close carriage from Nelson, through Smithville and Mount Washington, to Louisville. Here he rested awhile. A few days later the register of the "Southern Hotel," St. Louis, bore the inscription "F. C. Markland, Kentucky." Mr. Markland, whoever he was, was very cordially and warmly greeted by a group of men who were not unknown in the neighborhood, and who had a certain sort of notoriety as having once belonged to Quantrell's daring band. The group of old-time companions spent a few pleasant days on the banks of the Mississippi, after which Mr. "F. C. Markland" (who, of course, was none other than Frank James) journeyed as far as Kansas City, where he met his mother at the house of a relative, and from this point he went to San Francisco, arriving there in advance of Jesse. It had been given out that Frank was going to sail to California, but that was probably only a ruse to put his enemies on the wrong track.

Frank and Jesse met at last at the home of their uncle, Mr. D. W. James, who was then proprietor of the Paso Robel Hot Sulphur Springs. Here the brothers spent a calm and peaceful life for months. No one could have imagined that these two quiet, amiable young men had made at least three States of the Union tremble with the terror of their names. They could be most gentlemanly and polite. And if Frank created the impression by his reticence that he was one of the most retiring of young men, Jesse won for himself golden opinions on account of his kindly, genial disposition. Through the whole of that summer of 1869 the brothers lived without a single adventure, save the very desirable change from weakness to robust health. Frank's hip grew strong, Jesse's lung yielded to the kindly influences of the beautiful climate, and before the autumn sun had touched the far-spreading woodlands with tints and hues of golden splendors, the young men who came to Pass Robel broken-down and emaciated were as strong and robust as ever. And with returning health and vigor came back the old spirit of daring and wild adventure. Whatever firm resolves they made in the day of their weakness as to a quiet honest life for the future, these resolves began to weaken with their increasing strength. It was the old story:

"When the devil was sick,
The devil a saint would be;
When the devil grew well,
The devil a saint was he."

Moreover, it must be remembered [that the very air they breathed was laden with the spirit of adventure and unrest. The mining camps of Nevada were the homes of wild romance. Frank and Jesse took a journey up the mountains without any special purpose other than that of seeing the country. Of course, they were not likely to risk their lives among the miners of the Sierras unarmed. So, carrying with them their weapons of defense—their faithful companions of the days of peril—they started forth. The camp life was most congenial to them. And, to add to their pleasure, they found several old companions who had followed the black flag of Quantrell in the old days. They prospected, they played sportsman, till little by little the old fires were kindling, and there needed only some circumstance to set the old guerrilla flames aglow.

The occasion was not far to seek. Frank and Jesse, with two old Missourian acquaintances, took a journey into the region of the Sonoma Mountains, where a small tributary of the Humboldt river cuts the foothills of the range. There was a new encampment called "Battle Mountain." And, to use the emphatic language of these four Missouri boys, they thought they would break the monotony of life by going to Battle Mountain "just to shake up the encampment!" These camping towns spring up as if by magic. And very often just as rapidly pass from sight. So that now the traveler in these mountain regions comes often upon the relics of a deserted hamlet that served the purpose of the hour and then was left to rot and ruin. Some lucky "find" would determine the locality. A main street would be laid out. Saloons, eating-houses, dance-houses, and gambling-hells, with a sufficient number of shanties for the dwelling of the men, would make up the "place." And, over and over again, the gold for which men had toiled so hard for weeks would all be squandered in a single night's debauch. Battle Mountain had the reputation of being a "rattling place." It had among its strange inhabitants men of honorable position, charmed by the hope of finding sudden wealth; and men of easy mind and careless mien, who were simply traveling to see what was to be seen, and others of dark intent; who knew best of all how to gamble and carouse, and always to be ready with bowie knife and revolver as the quick and sure settlers of any argument that might arise. Hard work by day, and at night women, whiskey and cards, this was the order of Battle Mountain. And it was to "shake up" this encampment that Frank and Jesse James and their two companions from Missouri, came. They had not been here long when a number of gambling blacklegs, who little knew the sort of men they had to deal with, formed a plot to swindle these green boys from Missouri. While the James boys did not drink, they were somewhat proud of their skill at cards. One fatal night, the boys of Battle Mountain, thirty or forty strong, were gathered together. Some were drinking, others playing at cards, others mapping out plans for future prospecting.

Jesse's friend, sitting at the same table, had just "called" the hand of his opponent—one of the men in the plot.

"Three kings," said the gambler, cheerfully.

"Three aces," coolly replied the other, as he exhibited them and raked down the "pot." Then he continued: "I discounted a king. When the cut was made for your deal, the bottom card was exposed. It was a king. You got your third king from the bottom. You mustn't do that again."

"It's a lie!" snarled the gambler through clenched teeth. And there was a look in his steel-gray eyes that meant mischief, as his hand felt down for his revolver.

The attention of the whole company was arrested. Jesse took in the whole situation in a moment. His companion had made a deliberate charge of cheating, and Jesse knew well that according to the gamblers' code of honor in such a case, "some one must die." There was a moment of peril for his friend, but quick as thought Jesse's pistol flashed its unerring fire, and the gambling cheat fell dead.

The remaining gambler made a violent lunge at Jesse with a knife, the blow was partly warded off by a tough buckskin bag of gold dust which Jesse carried—the next moment Jesse brought his pistol round with a swing, fired, and literally blew off the top of his opponent's head, and he fell with his face downwards upon the gambling table.

A perfect pandemonium ensued. Frank and his companion were ready for action in a moment. Howling and yelling and cursing rent the air. The gamblers of Battle Mountain found that these quiet-looking Missouri boys were incarnate devils when roused. But they had most to find out yet. There were four against thirty! Rather heavy odds! The lights were suddenly put out, and Jesse cried:

"Stand aside! Be ready!"

Frank and the other two men knew precisely what that meant. They made a rush for the door, amidst shots flying fast and free. Jesse covered their retreat with his pistol. They, having escaped, began to fire warily on the demoralized crowd. Jesse then made for the door, but two burly men with huge knives stood in the way. Jesse fired on one of them and he sank groaning to the earth, in a moment he sprang upon the other and dealt him so fearful a blow with the butt-end of his pistol that he fell insensible on his dying comrade. Over this bloody barricade Jesse crept and joined his friends outside.

When lights were obtained the interior of that gambling hell presented a ghastly sight. The half-drunken women were suddenly sobered. Three men lay dead, wallowing in pools of their own blood. Five others lay mortally wounded, groaning, cursing and blaspheming. The floor and walls were all bedabbled with human blood. A sudden impulse stirred a number of the survivors to follow and avenge this dreadful night on the escaped Missourians.

A little more than a mile away they came upon the Jameses and their two friends. The leaders of the avenging mob ran yelling and howling toward them.

"Fall back!" cried Jesse, "Fall back! We have fought once in self-defense, and we can fight again." Then turning to his comrades he said, "Steady boys! Let every shot count."

On came the yelling pack, filling the air with blasphemous threatenings of death to the fugitive ones.

“Back, you d—d miscreants ! Stand back I say !” cried Jesse James.

But they rushed forward at the top of their speed.

“Boys, we are in for it,” said Jesse, quietly.

“All right ! Be ready !” Then he shouted: “Come on, d—n you ! Just come ahead and be killed !”

Four bullets quick and sharp sped their way to the oncoming mob, and in a moment four men fell wounded to the earth. The Missourians opened fire again and two others fell gashed and wounded. At this the avengers paused. The dauntless four in that moment escaped. The gamblers, however, treated them to a parting shot, seriously wounding one of the party. Jesse’s hat was shot off his head, but no further harm was done. They reached Minnemunca in safety. They had “shaken up” Battle Mountain with a vengeance ! Twelve men had fallen victims, and were dead or dying ! This was a new sensation in the great mining State. The quiet, inoffensive-looking boys, who seemed to have more of the Sunday school teacher about them than the wild desperado, had left their unmistakable sign manual in the gold-diggers camp.

CHAPTER XVII.

RETURN OF THE ISHMAELITES.

RETURN OF THE ISHMAELITES—BANK ROBBERY AT GAL-LATIN—WHO WERE THE ROBBERS?—JESSE
ATTEMPT TO ARREST FRANK AND JESSE—MRS. SAMU-ELS AGAIN—NOT TO BE CAUGHT.

It was not safe for our heroes to try the experiment of eating their Christmas dinner in the neighborhood of the Sierras. After that fatal night at Battle Mountain, they became marked men, and it was on their part a stroke of sound policy to leave the hills and mountains of the golden West at the very earliest opportunity. They remained in seclusion only a few days and then they journeyed with all speed to their home in Missouri.

Arrived here, they soon found that, though they had many friends of the old guerrilla days scattered up and down, yet for the most part they were Ishmaelites indeed! Their hands had been against every man, and now every man's hand was against them. And in that region of country everything that went wrong, every theft small or great, every annoyance important or trivial, was laid to the door of the James brothers. And, though much may be said concerning the circumstances that first drove, or attracted, the boys to the camp of Quantrell, their subsequent conduct bears only one conclusion; that whatever they had to suffer of injustice in this respect, they had only themselves to thank for it. They were but suffering the natural and inevitable result of such a course as they had pursued.

It is true, as has been before insisted in these pages, that, altogether outside these old guerrilla forces, there were bands of wild freebooters who scrupled at nothing; to whom the sanctity of womanhood and the defenselessness of children counted for nothing, when they crossed their path or thwarted their purposes. But between these awkward desperadoes and their clumsy deeds, and the well-organized and invariably successful plans of the old time guerrillas there was a wide difference. The Jameses and the Youngers and the Andersons left their own imprint distinct and definite on all their doings. A thousand deeds of lawless adventure were so effectively done, and all trace so completely covered that a successful raid was without much consideration attributed to the most successful leaders of the time, Frank and Jesse James.

And yet it can not be said that their Ishmaelism was without cause. Had not the home of their childhood been the scene of many a fierce onslaught on the part of the Federal militia? If Dr. Samuels was alive it was because he had been secretly rescued after having been left for dead. And one of Jesse's earliest remembrances was of being subjected to treatment both shameful and cruel. And the seeds of shameless cruelty will bring forth abundant harvests.

Vigilance committees were hounding their comrades without mercy. And they knew that the zest with which these were exterminated would be ten times more fierce if they should chance to fall into their hands.

On the 16th of December, 1869, Gallatin, a flourishing little city in Daviess County, Missouri, had an experience similar to that of Russelville. The chief difference being that cold-blooded murder was added to robbery. It was a dark, gloomy day such as abound in the month of December. It was supposed that the bank was just then pretty flush in funds. All at once a band of armed horsemen rushed into the quiet street that runs like an artery through Gallatin, with wild cries and curses they ordered all the inhabitants to keep their houses at peril of instant death. Two of the band rushed into the bank (believed to be Cole Younger and Jesse James) and holding a revolver before the face of Captain John W. Sheets demanded that he give up the keys. The safe door was already open. The booty was secured. The amount, however, was small, reaching only about $700. The gold being put in a bag, the robber who had held Captain Sheets in silence deliberately fired a bullet through his brain and the unfortunate cashier fell dead at his assassin's feet. The robbery completed and the murder done, the wild band fled from Gallatin as quickly as they entered, and left no trace behind them save the plundered bank and the lifeless form of a gallant gentleman who was universally respected. The wanton cruelty of this murder awoke the bitterest feeling throughout the whole neighborhood. Captain Sheets was a great favorite in business and social circles. The robbery was altogether lost sight of in the graver consideration of the foul and unnatural murder, the motive for which it was hard to imagine. It was, however, afterward averred that the murderer mistook him for a certain Lieut. Cox, who, it was said, in a raid against the guerrillas, had killed the notorious Bill Anderson. The whole country was roused and a most exciting chase took place. But the robbers were well mounted, and, though they were pursued to the borders of Clay County, the pursuit was vain, for at that point they lost all track of them. The robbers were on what they significantly called "their own stamping ground."

Who were these robbers? The universal voice saddled the robbery and murder on the Jameses and the Youngers, which Jesse however most indignantly repudiated. So bold and intrepid was Jesse in this denial that he wrote to the Governor of Missouri on his own behalf and on that of his brother Frank offering to surrender to the officers of the law and submit to a trial, on condition that the Governor would guarantee them a safe escort securing them from the chances of mob violence and lynch law in Daviess County. Governor McClury declared that he did not believe that the boys had anything to do with the robbery. For a time his decision had some influence on public opinion. But there was a deep under-current of feeling that if these young men Frank and Jesse James had not been actually concerned in the operations, they were nevertheless parties to, if not instigators of the plot. As years went on, further developements led to the now thoroughly received opinion that Captain Sheets died at the hand of Frank or Jesse James. Amongst those who believed most thoroughly in the guilt of the James brothers was Captain John Thomason of Clay County, Missouri. He thought that it was no use in the world to deal in half measures with these miscreants. He was persuaded that there would be no peace, no security for life or property as long as they were at large, hence he put himself at the head of a band of men who were resolved at all hazards and at any cost to arrest Frank and Jesse James and bring them to justice. Captain Thomason had served during the war on the confederate side, he had also sustained the office of Sheriff of Clay County to the great admiration of the county at large. He carried with him great moral influence as a man who was the outspoken friend of law and order. No man in Clay county could command a larger following for any good purpose. The James brothers were made acquainted with the purpose of Captain Thomason, they knew the man they had to deal with, but they were not in the least dismayed. They went out to meet him and his band. The meeting is said to have taken place near the home of the Samuels. Captain Thomason demanded their immediate unconditional surrender. Of course, as may be well supposed, they laughed the demand to scorn, and seemed disposed to treat the whole affair as a huge farce. When the thing assumed a more serious aspect and Captain Thomason hinted at force. Then there was nothing for it but to meet fire with fire. And the guerrilla boys proved themselves ready for the encounter. A shot from Jesse's pistol brought down Captain Thomason's horse dead under him. The fray lasted only a few minutes. The pursuing party felt that to proceed would only be to endanger life with little prospect of capturing their prey, so they returned, and Frank and Jesse rode back home scathless and triumphant. It is one of the wonders of this wonderful history that these mauraders were hunted so incessantly and never caught. After the Gallatin affair the Daviess county officials hunted them in vain. Pinkerton and his staff from Chicago, and a posse of shrewd skillful detectives from St. Louis hunted them in vain. It is quite evident that many who might have given some information, felt no particular desire to place themselves in an attitude of antagonism to these desperate characters. The dread they had inspired far and near made all timid souls conclude that it was best to let the James brothers alone, and so they got a pretty wide berth, and enjoyed a freedom that would certainly have been denied to less reckless men.

Captain Thomason was annoyed at his defeat; and did not hesitate to express himself in unmeasured terms; not staying even to express very strong and uncompromising opinions concerning Mrs. Samuels whom he regarded as the hateful guiding spirit of these murderous sons. Indeed he said over and over again that only such a mother could bring forth such sons. A remarkable and characteristic interview between the two is reported.

Mrs. Samuels had heard of the strong things Captain Thomason was saying, and thought perhaps to intimidate him by threats. Whatever was the purpose this irrepressible woman, now close on sixty years of age, rode ten miles on horseback to give Captain Thomason a piece of her mind. She entered the house without ceremony as the family was dining and walking up to Captain Thomason in a resolute tone of voice.

“Captain Thomason, I understand you have called me a —— !”

“Yes, I did,” returned the Captain, “and I want you to understand that I mean every word I say, and, mark me, if ever I or any of mine are injured by you or yours in the least thing, I swear before heaven and earth that there shall not be a stone left of your house, nor a single member of your family spared !”

“Indeed !” said the stern-faced woman.

“And if any killing is to be done,” continued the Captain, "take my advice and see you kill all my family; don't let a member survive, or the injury might be avenged!"

At this Mrs. Samuels, with a look of supreme disgust, strode out of the room and journeyed home feeling that her errand had been a failure.

CHAPTER XVIII.

FORTY THOUSAND DOLLARS.

BANK PLUNDERING CONTINUED—RAID AT COLUMBIA-KENTUCKY—MURDER OF MR. CASHIER MARTIN —ANOTHER FRUITLESS CHASE—THE ROBBERS AT CORYDON, IOWA—
$40,000 AT A SWEEP!

The best-filled coffers will not hold out forever. And the robbery of another bank was a sure and certain sign that the funds of the robbers were running low. The spring of 1872 found Frank and Jesse James and the three Younger boys all in Kentucky, whither they generally fled when danger threatened. They had many friends in Kentucky, and were as secure here as any place in the world. Of course they were careful never to appear publicly in company. Their policy was to keep apart, and they have often spent days in the same place as though they were the most perfect strangers, and more than once they have undergone the farce of being introduced to each other by strangers.

A whole year or more had passed since the last bank raid, and the public mind began to rest in a sense of security. Besides which, the managers of banks, as may well be expected, looked more diligently to the means and methods of security and defense. But while there is no insurmountable difficulty in guarding against ordinary dangers, the special and unexpected and sudden dangers are not so easily foreseen.

Columbia is a pleasant little village in the county of Adair, in Kentucky. A quiet, sleepy little place that knew nothing to disturb the even tenor of its way, save when the holding of the Courts of Session stirred the dull monotony of the place. For Columbia was the seat of Justice for the county. On the afternoon of April 29th, 1872, all was in statu quo, as Wilkins Micawber would say. It was about 2 o'clock in the afternoon. The bank was still open. The Pres. of the Bank of Deposit was chatting with Mr. R. A. C. Martin, the respected cashier of the bank, and Mr. Garnett, an old citizen of Columbia. All in a moment the conversation was interrupted by a most unusual occurrence. Five well-armed horsemen dashed into the street. There was the old order. Promiscuous firing of pistols, oaths and threatenings; every human being was driven into the house on peril of instant death. Before the gentlemen in the bank could for a moment guess the meaning of this strange tumult, Frank James and Cole Younger dismounted and entered the bank. Without a word the bandits went round the counter, each holding a pair of cocked pistols in his hands.

“Will you give up the sate keys, d——n you?” said one of them to the cashier, holding a pistol within a yard of his head.

“I will not !” was the answer of the brave cashier Martin.

“Then, d—n you, will you open the safe? Come, quick. I’ve no time to waste. If you don’t I’ll blow your brains out! Quick, d—n you, quick ! Now will you?”

“I will not. I will d—”

Poor, brave Martin had no time to finish the sentence. A bullet crashed through his temples. Blood and brains spurted out upon counter and on floor, and the valiant guardian of the public funds fell dead at his murderer’s feet.

The on-lookers seemed paralyzed. They were horror-stricken and utterly powerless. The robbers then gathered together all they could, which only amounted to a little over $300 in cash. For the robbers had outwitted themselves. The secret of the combination was with the dead cashier. Placing such spoils as they had in hand in a sack, they remounted their horses and gave the signal for departure. They went as quickly as they came.

No sooner had the news of the raid spread, than another of those fruitless pursuits began. The robbers were pursued to the mountains of Tennessee. One of the robbers called Saunders, but better known as Bill Longley the Texan desperado, was shot in Fentress County. The fact that Saunders was of this gang was proof sufficient in the minds of the Kentuckians that the robbers of the Columbia bank were none other than the James and Younger gang. There are others, however, who cling to the belief that neither Frank nor Jesse had any part in this fray.

Russelville ! Gallatin ! Columbia !

And, in less than twelve months after, the Bank of Corydon, Iowa, was in like manner robbed and raided. It was on the 28th of June, 1873, at about 10 o'clock in the morning. The bank was just opening for business, when seven desperadoes charged furiously into the center of the town, firing right and left and swearing to shoot dead everybody who remained in the streets. Their commands were obeyed. The streets were cleared. None of the inhabitants thought of offering any resistance. Three of the robbers dismounted and with cocked pistols entered the bank, swearing to blow the heads off any who dared to interfere with them, The six heavy dragoon pistols served to terrify those who were in the bank, and, with the memories of Captain Sheets and Mr. Martin before them, they yielded at discretion. The safe was opened and the contents thrown into a sack. It is said that the robbers made by this one haul a sum nearly approaching $40,000. The people in the bank were charged to order and silence, and one of the robber brood boasted that he could fetch a button off the coat of any of them with his pistol; so they had best have a care.

Of course after the consternation had given place to quieter moments, the inhabitants instituted a vigorous pursuit. The common result followed, Not one of the robbers were caught. So a handful of men, in the broad light of day, were able to go about murdering and plundering and no power was able to repress them. Corydon never again saw a dollar of its stolen money, nor caught a glimpse of the wild raiders who shook that June morning with threat and terror.

CHAPTER XIX.

A CHAPTER WITHOUT BLOOD

FRANK AND JESSE AS GENTLEMEN AT LARGE—EQUAL TO EVERY EMERGENCY—THE GRIM JOKE OF THE BROTHERS HUNTING FOR THEMSELVES — JESSE PLAYING RUSTIC.

It must not be for a moment supposed that Frank and Jesse James were always on the war-path. Apart from those periods of enforced leisure, when through dangerous wounds they were compelled to seek rest and retirement; they took many occasions to enjoy life to the full. The robbery of a bank would supply them with ample funds. And, as the old story goes, money easily gained is just as easily parted with. When the times were flush with them, they knew how to play the role of roystering and convivial gentlemen. They were widely dissimilar in their mental characteristics, but they knew each how to enjoy life to the full.

They enjoyed the luxury of travel. But they never travelled together when using their own names, and they were never very far apart. Over the plains of Texas or through the swarming centres of civilization, they were always near enough to help each other if the bell of danger rung. Their reputation was their safeguard, if they should chance to be known in the larger towns or cities. Everyone who knew them, knew that there was nothing surer than the aim, and nothing deadlier than the fire that flashed from the pistols of Frank and Jesse James. And so discretion suggested that it would be well to leave the James boys alone. They might have been arrested a thousand times, but what is everybody's duty is nobody's duty; and, moreover, there was a widespread feeling that anything done to Frank or Jesse would be sure to be avenged with an awful vengeance! It was well known that the corner stone of their policy was: "Dead men tell no tales." And if a question rose as to the advisability or unadvisability of shooting a man, or a dozen men, their invariable method was to shoot, and leave the question for more convenient consideration. Under such circumstances can it be greatly wondered at that a policy of non-interference has so largely prevailed.

"Do you see that rather sedate, well-dressed fellow, sitting over in that large chair just by the pillar?" asked a gentleman of his companion, not very long ago, as they sat smoking in the great central hall of the Palmer House, Chicago.

"I do," was the response of the gentleman, who happened to be a Justice of the Peace for Cook County.

“Well,” said the first speaker, “do you know that that is the notorious outlaw Frank James?”

“Indeed !” said the magistrate.

“Yes,” said his informant, “no doubt at all about it. He has registered as Edwin Jackson, of Detroit; but he has been spotted by a dozen men, there is no doubt about his being the great Missourian bandit, Frank James. Say, Judge, what a grand opportunity for you ! You might have him arrested, and make quite a name and fame !”

“No thank you !” said the legal dignitary.

“But you are a Justice of the Peace and society looks to you !” said his friend, growing quite eloquent.

“That’s just where it is,” said the magistrate, “I’m a Justice of the Peace, and I want peace. Society looks to me, and I want it to go on looking to me. That may or may not be Frank James, it’s none of my funeral. But if it were Frank or Jesse James or any of that infamous gang, and I arrested him, it would probably be my funeral, and soon ! Do you think that because a man is a magistrate he must therefore be a fool ? Come and let us take a turn along State street.”

Exiled and outlawed as they were, they dared to the uttermost, and went up and down enjoying themselves without any fear of arrest. They took the precaution to wear false names, but that was all the false they did wear. Anything like an attempt at facial disguise, or make up in form or dress, was beneath the dignity of these dauntless men. They trusted to courage and good sense and their ready wits. They never trusted to good luck. They trusted to themselves, and they seem to never have trusted in vain !

They seem to have been equal to every emergency. They took long journeys and sea voyages, and were often brought into contact with people of culture and refinement. Amongst those they were perfectly at home. Frank's reticence always served him in good stead, while Jesse's free spirit and manner always made him appear to advantage as a most genial young gentleman, of good education and breeding. With the roystering and the merry they could take their part, and be as loud and jolly as the best of them. With the vulgar and the loafing they had nothing in common, they disdained the companionship of the low; just as Dick Turpin would have disdained a clumsy thief. Frank and Jesse James were the aristocrats of wild adventure.

They had several aliases. Jesse was known for a long time in New York, and widely respected, too, as Charles Lawson, of Nottingham. While they were being hunted and sought for in Missouri and Kentucky and Texas, they were having a good time a thousand miles away; while their foes were beating about the woods of Jackson county, Frank was dining at the Palmer House, Chicago; and Jesse was entertaining a number of friends at the Astor House, New York. Or while Pinkerton's men were hard at work hunting the boys, quite sure that they had got on the right trail at last, the affectionate brothers would be refreshing their love of the beautiful from the drawing-room window of Prospect House, Niagara Falls, or laughing at Joe Jefferson's "Rip Van Winkle," at Whitney's theatre, in Detroit; or listening to Lawrence Barrett's divine declamations at Booth's theatre in New York.

Sometimes they would perpetrate the grim joke of joining their pursuers in search of themselves. More than twice or thrice they have been daring enough, in an unknown region of country to engineer a movement in search of those wild, lawless James brothers, and to lead the search themselves, seemingly most intent on catching their prey.

A most amusing story is told of Jesse, who on a memorable occasion played the part of rustic to his heart's content. It was the second day after the bank robbery, at Corydon Iowa. The whole region was up in arms and in hot pursuit after the robbers. Jesse was riding along a way not much frequented, when he became suddenly aware of two men riding in hot fury not far distant. Confident that they had neither seen nor heard him, his ready wit suggested a speedy course of action. Jesse was dressed in the rough attire of a granger, and assumed a most uncouth simplicity both of dialect and manners. When he came within reasonable distance of the two well-armed, well-mounted horsemen, he, with a wary eye on their pistols and his hand not far from his own, accosted them:

"Well, gentlemen, hev you met anybody up the road ridin a hoss an' leadin' ov another one, 'cause you see as how I lives down on the Nodaway, an' some infernal thief has gone off with my two best hosses. I hearn about two miles further down at the blacksmith shop that a man passed there about a hour an' a half ago with two hosses, an' they fits the descriphun of mine to a T. Have you seen sich?"

"No. Where are you traveling from?"

"Why, Lord, I've come all the way from the Nodaway. The infernal thieves are using us up awful. I wish I'd come on the infernal son of a seacook whose taken my hosses. I do, you bet, I'd go for him with these 'ere irons. I would that!" And Jesse revealed his "weapons" as he called them.

"Did you see anybody on the road ahead?" asked the tallest of the two horsemen.

"Not for some miles. I met four ugly-looking customers this mornin'. They looked like they might 'a been hoss-thieves theirselves. D——n the hoss-thieves, say I!" said he rustic Jesse.

"Thieves are plenty now-a-days. They come into towns and break banks in open daylight. How far did you say the four men were ahead?"

"Well, I didn't say; but it must be more'n two hours since I met 'em, an' they were a ridin' purty fast, an' I've rid my hoss almost down, as you can see," answered Jesse.

"What kind of looking men were they?" asked the robber-hunters.

"Well, one was a sizable man, with a long, red beard, and a flopped black hat on, a ridin' on a big chestnut sorrel hoss, an' one more was a smallish man, with very black hair and beard, and sharp black eyes, an' he was a ridin' on a roan hoss, an' another was an oldish man, with some gray among his beard, an' he wore a blue huntin' shirt coat, an' he was a ridin' a gray hoss, and the last feller was a little weazle-faced chap, with tallowy complexion, who didn't ware no beard, an' he rode on a dark-brown hoss," said the rustic with rustic simplicity.

The two robber hunters then consulted together.

"That's their description," said one. "Precisely," said the other. "Shall we follow?" asked one. "I would like to," replied the other. "But there are four of them," was the remark in rejoinder. "Yes, that is bad. If Ed, Dick and Will would just hurry up. Those fellows are no doubt very dangerous men," was the comment of one. "You bet they are," was the response.

All this time Jesse had listened as an interested party. Now he thought he was privileged to make an inquiry.

"What's up, strangers, anyhow?" Jesse asked.

"You blow it! Don't you know that the Corydon bank, up in Iowa, was robbed yesterday?"

Jesse opened his eyes in well-feigned surprise.

"You don't say so!" he ejaculated.

"Yes, in broad daylight, and the men you met are the robbers, no doubt. There's a big reward offered to catch them."

"What's this country comin' to anyhow? Hoss-thieves down on the Nodaway, an' bank rogues up to Iowa. 'Pears like hard workin' honest folks can't get along much more," grumbled Jesse.

"Could you go back with us?"

"I'd like to, but the cussed hoss thieves will get away. Besides, you see, my horse is mighty nigh played out hisself. Howsumever, I might ride with you as fur as I can. D——n all thieves, say I, don't you?"

And Jesse actually turned around with the two pursuers of the robbers, in pursuit of another posse of pursuers which Jesse had been enabled accurately to describe by having seen them pass him while lying snug in a dense thicket.

"They might catch the robbers, an' as he'd have a sheer ov the reward, it would be better'n nothing at all fur his stolin hosses."

For miles Jesse rode with them, till, coming near a railway station, he begged to be excused on the ground that his horse was becoming lame. His excuse was accepted and he left the pursuers to their vain and hopeless pursuit.

A thousand stories might be told of a most amusing character as to their coolness in the very midst of danger. One day, when the whole of the special detective forces of St. Louis and Chicago were hunting them, they were bold enough to traverse the streets of St. Louis, and Jesse, under the guise of Mr. William Campbell, is said to have done business with a St. Louis bank that very day.

CHAPTER XX.

KANSAS AND STE GENEVIEVE.

FAIR DAY IN KANSAS CITY!—SUDDEN CHANGE IN THE DAY'S DIVERSIONS!—THE CASH-BOX STOLEN!—
STE. GENEVIEVE!—THE BANK PLUN-DERED!—THE ROBBERS ESCAPE!

The bell rings! The curtain rises on a new scene. It is not a bank to be raided, nor a murder to be accomplished, unless the exigencies of the hour demand it. We are in the midst of jocund merriment. It is a time of mirth and gay delight! It is Fair Day in Kansas City. It was a lovely Autumn day, September 26th, 1872. It was Thursday. The great day of the Fair, the "big day" of the Kansas City Exposition. From early morning there had been a din of drum and trumpet and gong! Thousands upon thousands had poured in from all quarters. Leavenworth and Sedalia, St. Joseph and Moberly, Lawrence and Clinton and regions further removed had sent in their crowded trains. All went merry as a marriage bell! Subordinate exhibitors were taking advantage of the time, and under the shadow of the great exhibition they erected their side-shows. It was wonderful what might be seen for a dime! The fat lady with the flowing beard, the calf with five legs and two heads, the wild panther from the trackless West, and a Tasmanian devil, all for ten cents! If you were not satisfied, the generous showman declared you should have your money returned, and a chromo of the Benicia Boy thrown in to comfort you! There was art combining with the wonderful to satisfy the bucolic mind! The renowned and only Madame Spezterini would perform on nine different musical instruments, and would be accompanied by the famous twin brothers Pioletti, who had performed before all the crowned heads of Europe! All for a dime! A most enterprising showman had gathered together a small menagerie, and had secured the services of a very fluent assistant, whose power of lungs would have fully qualified him for a position as missionary to the deaf. This glib, loud-tongued showman overshadowed all the rest of the showmen, and always had a large crowd listening to his merry invitations, ending his urgent entreaty in this remarkable formula:

“Walk up, ladies and gentlemen, walk up, and see the kangaroo, the cockatoo, the sea lion, the white bear, the jumping-jack, the laughing hyena, and the man-monkey!”

With great emphasis on the “man-monkey,” he would point at some gaping youth in the throng of bystanders, and the whole crowd would go off in roaring fits of laughter at his evident discomfiture.

There were viands of the choicest, pies with crusts of adamant, cakes that made you think only of sawdust, puddings purporting to be plum-puddings, that looked like slabs of human flesh in the worst stages of smallpox, the eating of five cents' worth of which would insure you a vision of your grandmother

In the still silence of the voiceless night."

And the drinks—nectar for the gods!—all for five cents a glass! Pink libations that shone with a richer color than the roseate faces of the maidens fair who thronged the crowded streets on that bright Autumn day. The banners were streaming, the music was thrilling the listening ear. That indescribable noise that only can be made by a vast crowd was dinning and surging and swelling. There were twenty thousand people on the Fair ground that September afternoon, and thirty thousand more were crowding and surging up and down the streets of Kansas City.

One of the special features of that afternoon's entertainment was the races. Ethan Allen was to trot against a running mate at five o'clock. The people were crowding into the Fair ground between four and five in masses. The ticket-sellers and the gate-men were doing a roaring trade. Mr. Hall, the secretary and treasurer of the association, had counted up the receipts of the day and found the same reached nearly $10,000 in hard cash. Arrangements had been made to bank this money at the First National Bank, though it was considerably after banking hours.

Mr. Hall called one of his trusty assistants and gave him a tin box containing the money, and sent him to deposit it in the bank according to arrangement. The idea of this box being stolen in a street crowded with tens of thousands of people was never dreamed of. It would have been regarded as quite preposterous to think any one would have the daring to attempt so wild an exploit. The young man who had charge of this box, started off carrying the treasure in his right hand.

Just at this moment the general attention was arrested by the clatter of hoofs. Seven well armed horsemen rode along, among whom, it is now universally believed were Frank and Jesse James and Bob Younger. Their dress and manner were such, that some of the more credulous spectators thought that this was a part of the show, and that the management had arranged for these "mummers" or "cowbellians" as part of the provided entertainment.

They were not kept long in doubt. The strange company dashed along, the crowd making sudden way for them. One little girl was within a hairs' breadth of being trampled to death. In a moment Jesse James sprang from his horse, drew his pistol and held it before the face of the luckless bearer of the treasure, while he snatched the box from his astonished grasp; and before either the cashier or the gaping crowd could take in the situation, the aring robber had re-mounted his horse, and the whole gang, with cocked pistols pointed at the people, and swearing instant death to any who dared to interfere with them, swept away as swift and as mysterious as a whirlwind. Not a shot was fired, not a life was lost. Ten thousand dollars, not in bills and bonds, but in hard cash!

“Clean work!” said one of the robbers to his comrades with a shrill whistle, as they counted the spoils.

For even these plunderers preferred money unstained by blood, if they could so obtain it. But money they would have, and if blood stood in the way, then blood must flow.

A more daring deed than this theft of the cash-box at Kansas Fair the annals of crime does not present. The compeers and comrades of these wild raiders expressed their views of the whole affair in terse but suggestive language.

“The job was beautifully done,” they said.

When the robbers had escaped—when the horse was gone!—the horse in this case being the cash-box—then there was much ado about fastening the stable door. The management of the Fair, the magistrates, authorities, the sheriffs, the marshals, the constables, big-wigs, little-wigs and bald-heads; all turned out to shout after the lost horse and look well to the fastenings of said stable door.

Then there was hurrying and scurrying and hot pursuit! Over hill and over vale, by mountain and valley. The constables raged and the marshalls swore. But raging and swearing was all in vain. The robbers rode five miles out of the city. Broke open the tin box, counted and divided the "swag;" then hanging the box from the limb of a tree, as a daring sarcastic relic of their visit to Kansas City, they parted. Frank and Jesse James to their friends in Jackson County, Bob and Cole, Younger to Monégaw Springs, where they became the guests of a gentleman rejoicing in the name of Theodoric Snuffer.

The running of Ethan Allan was very tame that afternoon. Kansas City was in a doleful mood at the end of its great fair day. The hunters of the robbers came back vowing what they would have done if they had caught the miscreants, but the miscreants they caught not. They were willing enough to cook the hare in the most approved fashion, but, alas! the hare was not caught!

With the booty gathered from this daring feat the bandits were put in good financial position. So they spent the early part of the winter of 1872-3 in grand style. If they were not quite clothed in purple and fine linen they fared sumptuously every day. They had a period of the very jolliest hibernation. They ate of the best and drank the rosiest wines. Like the Monks of old—

"They sang and they laughed,
And the rich wine quaffed,
Till they shook the olden wells."

Early in the spring of 1873, Frank James and Jim Younger were sent into Nebraska, to gather all the information they could, relative to the express service, and especially the shipment of bullion and precious treasure from the West.

The remaining company began to feel impatient of the long delay of their comrades. So to break up the monotony and replenish the failing coffers of the gang, Jesse James, Bill Chadwell, Clell Miller, and Bob and Cole Younger resolved on one more bank robbery. The Savings Association Bank of Ste. Genevieve was fixed upon as the scene of their lawless endeavors.

Ste. Genevieve is a grand old Catholic town, of Missouri. It is more than a century old. The home and scene of French Catholic taste and politeness. "More than a century ago," says a distinguished author, "it was a beacon-light of civilization in the midst of the vast wilderness then known as the 'Far West.' Ste Genevieve has all the signs of taste and beauty that would remind the traveler of the Rhone and the Saone. It is a perfect garden of beauty and freshness. And the dwellers in this Missouri paradise, were a wise, thrifty people, and their savings bank was known to contain often as much as $100,000—the accumulated savings of a well-to-do thrifty community."

It was a beautiful spring morning, the 27th of May, 1873, Ste. Genevieve was looking its very loveliest. The whole air was perfume-laden with "Sharon's dewy rose." Mr. O. D. Harris, the cashier of the bank, accompanied by F. A. Rozier, a son of the Hon. Forman A. Rozier, the president of the bank, had left his garden home all bright and cheerful, little dreaming what an episode was at hand. The cashier and his young companion arrived at the bank, the door swung open and suddenly Mr. Harris and young Rozier were confronted by four armed men and accosted thus:—

“We have come to help you open the bank. Open the safe instantly, d—n you, we have no time to lose.”

“I am helpless and cannot resist you,” replied the overpowered Mr. Harris.

Meantime another of the robbers pointed a pistol at the head of young Rozier, and called out:

“You keep still, you d—d little rat, if you don’t want to have your brains blown out in an instant!”

“I? What for?” asked the young clerk, who had shown signs of desiring to create an alarm.

“Not another word, young devil,” said his stern-faced foe, “that’s enough! A blabbing tongue can be stopped, d—d easy.”

Taking the advantage of the moment and desiring that these strange visitors should have all his room and none of his company, he made a bold leap and sprang down the steps of the bank into the street. As he fled the fellow fired at him and cried. “Halt! halt! You wretched young cuss!”

The bullet tore through the shoulder of his coat and grazed his chin.

The report of the bullet roused the attention of a gentleman opposite, who seized his gun and was about to join the fray in defense of Mr. Harris. But the good man's wife must have been a lineal descendant of Pilate's wife, for she exhorted her spouse to mind his own business. Like a wise man he obeyed, and doing so probably saved his own life and that of Mr. Harris.

By this time the safe was opened. But the robbers were much disappointed, for instead of making a haul of something like $80,000 or $100,000, they only secured booty to the extent of about $8,500. Mr. Harris was then relieved of a beautiful gold watch which he wore. And the robbers then started away.

Just as they were leaving the city one of the horses of the robbers ran away and the bag containing their ill-gotten gains broke in the street. It was but the work of a moment to lay violent hands on a German farmer who had a wagon and team. They made him, under threat of instant death, ride after the runaway horse, the rest of them guarding the treasure till his return. The citizens were waking up to the condition of things and began to arm and prepare for a battle. But the German farmer returned with the runaway horse. And the robbers mounted and rode off. A dozen men were by this time ready for pursuit and they gave chase and came very near to the runaways. The company of plunderers turned and, facing their pursuers, swore by everything that was terrible, that if they came one step nearer they would shoot them dead. The wise and heroic twelve at once returned.

There was the usual organized search with the usual vigorous proceedings and the usual utter failure. It was said that a man had been seen who looked very much like a robber. But that was almost as definite as the Scotchman's declaration, that he had "once seen the Duke of Argyle, or a man that looked unco—like him."

CHAPTER XXI.

TRAIN-WRECKING.

THE COUNCIL OF JULY — A NEW DEPARTURE — THE WATCHERS FOR THE TRAIN—DAY DAWN—SUNDAY, JULY 21ST, 1873—THE TRAIN WRECKED—
THE PASSENGERS ROBBED.

After Ste. Genevieve came a brief respite. The fearless raiders had not spent the days in entire idleness, if they had spent them in luxury. They were busy enough forming plans for the future. The results of the pioneer journey of Frank James and Bill Younger into Nebraska were now under consideration. The method of bank raiding was growing quite monotonous. They longed for some novelty to be imported into their robber experience. Early in the month of July—the Jameses and the Youngers and Robert Moore—a new importation—a desperado from the Indian territory, held a council of war in Jackson County, Missouri.

The subject for consideration was to find the best and most successful method of robbing a railway train. The first scheme to rob a train on the Hannibal & St. Joe railway was rejected. The pros and cons were fully gone into and it was at last determined to make Iowa the scene of this first train-wrecking experiment. For it was an experiment; just as truly as any new departure in a mercantile firm may be considered an experiment. There was a good deal to be considered, and only cold-blooded men who set no important value on human life could have entertained such diabolical plans. The robbery of a bank only involved the murder of a few persons. But to deliberately wreck a train, and an express train, would probably insure the loss of many lives, and would most certainly jeopardize the lives of every passenger on the train.

Hitherto these followers of Quantrell had counted it as a part of their high moral code, never to involve in their schemes women or children. The purity of the former and the helplessness of the latter were to be held sacred. But in this devilish scheme for train wrecking women and children were equally involved. And to overlook these considerations was to violate what Quantrell would have called "the dignity of honorable warfare." Before the early July council closed the plans were fully matured.

Comanche Tony—a desperate Texan ranger—was added to the plundering brotherhood; on the night of Saturday, July 20th, 1873, the gang, comprising the James boys, the Youngers, Bob Moore, and this Texan Tony, met—each of course, coming different ways—at a point about fourteen miles east of the city of Council Bluffs on the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific railway, and each wide awake for a stake.

They met under the cover of the night, selected the exact spot for their direful work. They determined to wreck the morning express train bound eastward; supposing it would carry a great mass of bullion from the gold fields of California. The robbers hoped for gold. Silver was too cumbersome; as was afterwards proved again and again from the fact that in subsequent train robberies they have deliberately spurned bars and bricks of silver, and have left them on the floor as "too heavy to be bothered with." But gold! They wanted gold! In any shape or form, or coin. They wanted gold!

The train was due to pass their point of ambush about three o'clock in the morning. All night they waited and watched scarcely exchanging a word with each other, and when they did, not above a whisper. Three or four rails were loosened and torn from their places, Several cross ties were placed in position to be used the moment they were required. They worked and watched and waited in silence. They had chosen a most suitable spot. It was fourteen miles from Council Bluffs, six miles from Adair, and about the same distance from Des Moines. There was not a single human habitation for miles around.

It was day dawn on that summer Sabbath morning. Such a summer dawn as can only be seen in these glorious Western regions. The roseate hues flashed all the eastern sky, and from their secret lairs crept the murderous robber brood, to deeds of plunder and of blood, despite the holiness of the day.

The rumbling of the train was heard in the distance. The gang set to work with awful dogged determination. As the train crossed the Turkey Creek bridge, the loosened rails were thrown apart, and half a dozen cross ties were thrown across the track just above.

The glaring headlight showed to the vigilant eye of John Rafferty, the trusty engineer of the train, the danger ahead!

But he saw too late!

The train was speeding to its doom at the rate of twenty-five miles an hour!

"My god, the rails move!" yelled John Rafferty to his fireman.

With this wild cry on his lips, and a wilder look in his eye, the brave engineer reversed the engine and applied the air-brakes. But it was in vain! The gigantic wheels sped over the sixty feet of firm iron that lay before them, the engine like a wild demon goaded on to madness ploughed into the bank and rolled over on its side.

The air-brakes had stopped the train, but the concussion had killed the valiant Rafferty, who lay with upturned face dead on that bright summer Sunday morning! Dead because he did his duty!

Then followed a scene of indescribable confusion and horror! Amid the screams and cries of half-awakened women and children, the robbers set to work, yelling—not like Indians in honorable warfare—but rather like demons set on fire with the madness of hell, these desperadoes rushed forth discharging their pistols through the coach windows, demanding in the most lordly style that every passenger should keep still. They then rushed into the cars firing over the heads of the inmates to alarm and terrify them. If any man ventured to go forward or leave his seat under any pretense a revolver was held before his face and a threat supported by an awful oath that if he dared to wink an eyelid he should die the death of a dog.

The express car was broken into, and the messenger in charge had his arm broken and was forced to unlock the safe. The robbers secured some $6000. And the poor guardian of the mails had his watch taken and ten dollars, the only money he possessed. After this every passenger was searched and robbed of money and jewelry. The spoils were put in a sack and the masked robbers sought their horses, and as the light broadened that peaceful summer morning they took their way southward, $25,000 richer for their dreadful exploit.

A most determined search was instituted. The robbers were tracked to Clare County, Missouri, but there every trace of them was lost. The successful raiders were safe in their hiding place.

A reward of $50,000 was offered for their arrest. But it was offered in vain.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE ROBBER BROOD IN ARKANSAS

MYSTIC CIRCLE—A STRANGE BILL OF MER-CHANDISE—SHAMELESS TAUNTS AND INSULTS.

The robbers of the West grew in grace, or rather in the shameful disgrace of their craft. The early friends of the James brothers were most enthusiastic in their declaration for years that Frank and Jesse would murder to avenge a cause or to retaliate for wrongs inflicted, but they would never under any circumstances rob. And again and again they most vigorously defended them from any participation whatever in the train robberies already recorded in these pages. It was impossible they could have been at these places at the times specified, and moreover they were not men greedy of plunder. They were bold, valiant, adventurous! But stoop to anything so low as vulgar robbery! Never! They were gentlemen, heroes if you will; but thieves! Never!

Whatever may have been the high heroic resolves of Frank and Jesse James in the early days of their lawless career, they were fast becoming robbers of the wildest and most cruel kind. It was true for them with a vengeance. "Facilis decensus averni." The way down was easily and swiftly traveled. From robbing banks to wrecking trains was but a step, and now a more shameful robbery than all has to be recorded.

The robbery of the sick, the invalided and the helpless is cowardly and cruel in the extreme. There is not one gleam of boldness to redeem this robbery from unqualified disgrace.

In December, 1873, a council of the bandits was held near the Big Blue in Jackson County. It was resolved to attempt a stage robbery, and the line between Malvern and Hot Springs was decided upon. And in spite of all attempts at the time to clear the James brothers of a share in the exploit, it is now abundantly established that the small, heartless gang who accomplished this deed consisted of Frank and Jesse James, Coleman and James Younger and Clell Miller.

On the 15th of January, 1874, the regular stage running from Malvern on the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway to Hot Springs had two ambulances for the sick invalids who were seeking such relief from their sufferings as the Hot Springs could afford. Already the Hot Springs, the Baden Baden of America, had gained a great reputation and was the resort of the afflicted from all quarters.

It was, however, the resort of the wealthy, not of the poor. The suffering pilgrims were of the well-to-do class, and the wealthy sick are always good game for robbers.

The robbers took advantage of these facts. And as the cavalcade proceeded quietly on its way it came to a most picturesque little spot called Sulphur Vale, near the old Gains mansion and about five miles from Hot Springs. The stage stayed for a few moments in order that the horses might quench their thirst from the waters of the Sulphur, after which the whole company proceeded on their journey. They had not gone more than a mile from the watering place when the driver of the stage was suddenly accosted.

With this unceremonious challenge, five men, dressed in Federal uniform, sprang from their ambush, each with cocked revolvers in their hands, threatening the lives of every passenger who dared to resist them. Of course the passengers were struck dumb with consternation and terror. Presence of mind is an uncommonly good thing but by no means common under such circumstances.

“Come, d——n you. Tumble out quick, we have no time to spare!” was the order of the foremost robber

“Oh, certainly!” said a Mr. Charles Morse, “We can do nothing else.”

“I am paralyzed in my legs and cannot walk,” cried a poor old victim of rheumatism within the stage, as the other passengers came tumbling out.

“Never mind! Stay where you are,” was the reply.

The stage was emptied, save of the one lame old gentleman. The rest of the passengers were ordered, with oaths and threats, and with pointed revolvers to confirm the threats, to form in a circle and hold up their hands, which they did without delay.

The brigands then began to search, examine and rob every passenger. Not one escaped, and not one seemed equal to offering the least resistance or making the slightest remonstrance. The net result in money and valuable approximated the sum of $4,000. The following may serve to show in detail the strangest bill of merchandise ever made out.

“Not a bad morning's work,” says one who counts only the gains of the robbers. But might not these men have earned more by honorable toil than by this sad course of life?

Having made quite certain that none of the passengers were armed, the robbers next indulged in grim and untimely jests at the expense of the plundered invalids. The fright of the travelers was greatly intensified by the blood-chilling threats of the desperadoes. They jested with one another and made banTERS to test their skill as pistol shots on the trembling and unarmed passengers. "Now," said Frank James to Cole Younger, "I will bet you the contents of that fellow's pocket-book," pointing to one of the travelers, who was a small tradesman at Little Rock, "that I can shoot off a smaller bit out of his right ear than you can." "I'll take the wager," responded Cole, "but you must let me have the first shot, because my eyesight is not as good as yours, and if you should hit his ear first the blood might confuse my aim." Frank insisted on shooting first, and in the wrangle the poor victim trembled until he could scarcely retain his feet, and with the most prayerful entreaties begged the robbers to take what he had but spare his life.

The rheumatic old gentleman was very nervous, and so to conciliate the robbers he begged to know to whom he should give the money. This somewhat amused them, and they agreed that he should retain his pocket-book and its contents. One of the passengers named Crump was examined by Jesse James. He had been a soldier and had fought in the late war.

"On what side?" asked Jesse.

"On the Confederate side, to be sure!" responded the wary invalid, thinking that the safest reply.

“Well, you look like an honest fellow,” said Jesse. “I guess you’re all right. We don’t want to rob Confederate soldiers. But the d—d Yankees have driven us all into outlawry, and we will make them pay for it yet.”

The robbers never liked newspaper men. Editors, reporters and journalists, of whatever sort and order, they utterly abhorred. The limbs of the law they despised. Detectives they laughed to scorn; but “damn all editors and reporters,” was one of their favorite expressions.

There was, unluckily for himself, an editor amongst this company of sick people, Mr. Taylor, of Lowell, Mass. He, of course, had to undergo a rigid examination.

“Where are you from?”

“St. Louis.”

“Yes, and d—n your soul, you are a reporter for the St. Louis Democrat, the vilest sheet in the land. Go to Hot Springs and send the dirty concern a telegram about this affair, and give them my compliments, will you?”

At this point Governor Burbank begged that his papers might be returned to him, on the ground that they could not possibly be any good to the robbers, but were invaluable to him. A very lengthy examination took place, which almost cost the Governor his life, for some papers attracted the attention of Jesse James which led him to think the Governor was only a detective in disguise. Satisfied on this point, he was permitted to pass on without more ado.

All this while one of the robbers, said to have been James Younger, held a double-barrel shot-gun cocked in his hand, which he pointed ever and anon at Mr. Taylor, the supposed Democrat reporter, making such cheerful remarks as these: "Boys, I'll bet a hundred dollar bill I can shoot his hat off his head and not touch a hair on it." And the others would respond with a banter of a very uncomfortable character, while the facetious bandit went on: "Now, wouldn't that button on his coat make a good mark. I'll bet a dollar I can clip it off and not cut the coat?"

At last, wearied of this diabolical sport, the robbers bade the robbed company good morning. Frank James raising his hat in most graceful style, saying: "The procession will now move on. We can assure you, gentlemen, we have had the greatest pleasure in meeting you. I am compelled to say, however, most reluctantly, that we hope never to meet you again! I am like lightning. I don't want to strike the same parties twice. Adieu, gentlemen, adieu!"

When the travelers reached Hot Springs they were in a sorry plight, not one of them having enough money to send a message home for additional funds, but the citizens kindly provided for their wants and exhibited much sympathy, but little or no attempt was made to capture the highwaymen. Indeed, any such effort would have undoubtedly terminated fruitlessly, for, in addition to the cunning and bravery of the bandits, the mountainous nature of the country would have prevented a pursuing party from making up the time lost in reporting the circumstances of the robbery.

CHAPTER XXIII.

ANOTHER TRAIN WRECKED AND ROBBED.

GADSHILL—THE STATION AGENTS MADE PRISONERS—THE TRAIN BOARDED—A CLEAN SWEEP—THEY WANT TO ROAST PINKERTON'S HEART
—THE ORGANIZED HUNT FOR THE DESPARADOES.

“Within a month, a little month” or ere the memory of the Gains' Place Stage robbery had subsided, the robbers were at their tasks again.

This time a train was to be wrecked and robbed. The train selected was the St. Louis & Texas Express, and the place for the exploit was a little lonely flag-station on the Iron Mountain road about a hundred miles south of St. Louis, and about seven miles from Piedmont, just where Shepherd Mountain and the Pilot Knob stand lofty guardians of the lonely vale of Arcadia.

It was in the very depth of winter, January 31st, 1874. The cold biting wintry day was closing. About half past three o'clock in the afternoon a company of seven men splendidly mounted and well armed came to the lonely flag-station of Gadshill. The only inhabitants of that bleak region were a station agent, a blacksmith, and two or three countrymen. It did not take long to place this small community under arrest, and by the usual threats of violence to ensure their silence. The train was to be boarded in this quiet uninhabited spot where it was utterly impossible to give anything like an effective alarm. With the tools from the blacksmith's shop they securely imprisoned their captives, and then set to work to prepare for the coming train.

The signal flag was displayed, and the switch opened, so that the train would be inevitably ditched if it attempted to pass. Everything being in order, the robbers waited for their unsuspecting prey.

The train left the Plum street depot, St. Louis about 9.30 o'clock in the morning and was not due till 5.40 o'clock in the evening. The train was in charge of Mr. C. A. Alford and was well loaded with passengers and express freight. The day wore on wearily enough. The long journey was tiresome as all long journeys are, except to people who always want the worth of their money, like the canny Scotchman who in answer to the complaint that the journey for London to Aberdeen was a long journey responded:

True to time the luckless Texas express drew near the Gadshill station. The shadows of twilight had deepened into darkness. All was mete and fit for the darker deeds to be perpetrated. The train came bowling along, and the engineer seeing the danger signal ahead brought the train to a stand still at the little station. No one was seen on the platform. But in a moment Cole Younger mounted the cab of the engine, and at the point of the pistol drew off the engineer and fireman in terror of their lives.

Mr. Alford the conductor immediately left the train to see what passengers were waiting to board her when he was met with this gentle demand.

“Give up your money and your watch d——n your soul and quick!”

Mr. Alford gave up about $50 he had in his possession and an elegant gold watch. And then he was hustled most unceremoniously into the little station house that had become a prison.

“Get in there and be quiet d——n you,” was all the brief instruction of the moment.

The train was now wholly in the hands of the robbers. And most effectively they managed their work. Terrifying the passengers by threats and pistol shots they induced them with very little hesitation to give up all the valuables they possessed.

One peculiar feature of this raid was that the robbers insisted on knowing the names of their victims. The timid pilgrims readily gave their names. But one bolder than the rest was curious to know why the name was demanded.

“What is your name!” asked one of the brigands of a Mr. Newell who was on the train.

“What do you want to know that for?”

“D——n you, out with your name, and ask questions afterward!" was the profane reply he received.

"Well, my name is Newell, and here is my money, and now I want to know why you ask me for my name?" said Mr. Newell with an attempt at pleasantry, fortified by a sort of grim smile.

"You seem to be a sort of jolly coon, anyhow," said the robber, "and I'll gratify you. That old scoundrel, Pinkerton, is on this train, or was to have been on it, and we want to get him, so that we can cut out his heart and roast it."

The boys had a mortal hatred of Pinkerton and all the detective clan much as they despised them. And no doubt if Mr. Allan Pinkerton had been on board and had revealed himself there would have been a somewhat tough encounter. Yet it is hardly likely that Pinkerton would have been so verdant as to have given his name.

The mail car was next plundered. Letters cut open, one of which contained $2,000. The total booty obtained by the robbers reached about $11,500. When the robbers had effected their work they released Alford and ordered the engineer to proceed with the train, which he did at once. They then mounted their horses and rode away in the darkness, and it is said that they rode sixty miles before they drew rein or gave themselves any rest. Then putting up at the house of the Hon. Mr. Mason a member of the State Legislature they demanded and obtained refreshments and rest.

The news of the robbery was of course telegraphed all along the line and an instant search was made.

A large body of well armed men tracked them a goodly distance. But the trail was lost. And in point of fact hunting these robbers was a thankless task. No commensurate reward was ever offered. And hunting these men, as a skillful and travelled huntsman once said, was a good deal like hunting tigers. It was all very well when you were hunting the tiger, but when the tiger turned round and began to hunt you it was another matter altogether.

CHAPTER XXIV.

AN EPISODE AT BENTONVILLE.

THE COMPANIONS OF THE JAMES BOYS—HUNTING IN EARNEST—A MOST DETERMINED SEARCH
UNION OF FORCES—A DARK TRAGEDY NEAR THEODORIC SNUFFER'S—JOHN YOUNGER'S LAST SHOT.

Bentonville is a quiet little town in Benton county, Arkansas. One of the principal stores—a sort of omnium gatherum, where everything from a mouse-trap to a pot elephant might be obtained—was kept by Thomas Craig & Son. This firm did a first-class business on a purely cash basis. On what was known as market day the country people from far and near would drive into Bentonville, and Craig & Son's store would be crowded until four or five o'clock.

On the afternoon of one of these market days, February 11th, 1874, between five and six o'clock, after a splendid day's business, Mr. Craig and his son were alone in the store, for at this time the country people were all well on their way home. The old gentleman was congratulating his son on the day's successful dealings, when all at once three strange looking men entered the store.

"What can I do for you, gentlemen?" asked Mr. Craig, senior, in his bland, polite manner, while his son Thomas came down from the desk to help serve the strange customers.

"You can keep quiet," was the blunt answer of the foremost of the men as he presented a revolver in each hand and continued: "If either of you speak a word or stir an inch I'll blow your brains out, so if you value your d—d lives, why be quiet!"

Looking round the Craigs saw two other men keeping guard at the door. Resistance was utterly impossible. The safe door was open; it was the work of a moment to rifle it of its contents. But the robbers were disappointed. They expected to make a big haul, but the Craigs had banked all their cash on hand at four o'clock, and the safe only contained about $150. This greatly disgusted the rogues, so they swept up about $200 worth of valuable silks and went as quickly as they came, leaving strict charge that if they attempted to raise an alarm before they had time to leave the town, they would shoot them dead at sight.

Having transacted their business in this summary manner they departed. There was little doubt in Bentonville but the robbers were the James gang. The Bentonvillians, disgusted that a robbery could be effected so quietly in their little town, mounted and gave chase to the robbers, but they returned with disappointment and disgust as the only reward of their pursuit of the reckless seizers of silks.

It was quite clear that there was a well organized raiding confederacy. All the robberies of banks, or wrecking of trains, indicated that there was as much shrewdness and system in their plans as there was boldness in their execution. Nothing was done at a guess. Every detail was most carefully considered, and hence the remarkable success that attended these raids. But a very natural question arises:

Of whom did this confederacy consist?

There were, to start with, the Jameses, Frank and Jesse, and the Younger brothers. Ol Shepherd was dead, shot dead because he would not surrender to the representatives of the law. His brother, George W. Shepherd, one of the old followers of Quantrell, had settled down after the war, and was married, and lived in Chaplin, Nelson county, Kentucky. After the raid on the Russellville bank he was arrested, tried, convicted and sentenced to a term of three years in the penitentiary. He left his wife at Chaplin in a house on which he had paid $600 purchase money. On his return from the penitentiary he found that his amiable wife, tiring of her loneliness, had made good use of the time, had obtained a divorce, and was again married, having brought a new husband to the old house at Chaplin. This arrangement took Mr. Shepherd a little aback. But he looked at the circumstances a little, and then treated the whole affair most philosophically. Why should he disturb, or attempt to disturb, these happy relations? The cat had been away, the mice would play. So he left them to their own sweet wills, and returned to his life of recklessness and shame, and there can be little doubt that George W. Shepherd was one of the boldest of this gang of desperadoes.

Bradley Collins and John Chunk, two wild freebooters who had wrought terror throughout Texas and the Indian Territory, were members of this circle.

Sid Wallace was a friend of the James boys, and had shared with them many a daring escapade. He was well known for at least eight years as "one of the gentlemen of the road." But he was less fortunate than his comrades; he ended his miserable life on the scaffold at Clarksville, Arkansas, in 1874.

Beside many others who came and went as fancy led them, Cal. Carter, Tom Taylor, Jim Clark, Jim Reed, John Wes. Hardin, Clem Miller, Jim Cummings, Jim Anderson, Sam Bass, and the notorious Bill Longley were members of this robbing, murdering fraternity which infested Missouri, Kansas, Colorado and Arkansas.

The daring Gadshill robbery created a wild-spread consternation. There was not only danger for those who lived in the neighborhood of the haunts of these robbers, but if trains were to be boarded and every passenger robbed and threatened with death, by men who always kept their dark vows to the very letter, who was safe? The whole community became thoroughly roused, and it was determined at all costs and risks to have these robbers hunted and caught.

Large rewards were offered by Governors Woodson of Missouri and Baxter of Arkansas. The American Express Company spared neither money nor pains, offering a very heavy reward for the capturing of the bandits. The United States authorities joined in the movement, and were willing to provide all necessary sinews of war. The public mind was thoroughly stirred. It was felt that this state of things was a disgrace to civilization, and that just as long as the public left any one stone unturned in the way of putting an end to these depredations, the public was to that extent responsible. So most determined search was resolved upon.

Allan Pinkerton was engaged by the Express Company. The whole force of detectives was greatly interested and not a little excited. There was money to be earned and a great reputation to be made if they succeeded in capturing these enemies of peace and order. The Secret Service force of the United States Government was ready to march at a moment's notice, the police and constabulary of Missouri and Arkansas were under orders. Everything pointed in the direction of success.

One company went in search of the Youngers. John and James Younger were known to have returned to Roscoe in St. Clair County. Their pocket books were well filled from the Gadshill fray. The whole detective force of St. Clair County was out under the direction of Captain W. J. Allen, whose real name was Lull. Allen was one of Pinkerton's most trusted men. Ed. B. Daniels of Osceola acted as guide, and a shrewd detective of St. Louis, known as a "fly cop," and calling himself Wright, made up the party in search of the notorious Youngers.

The three just named—Daniels, Allen, alias Lull, and Wright—were out riding one morning, March 16th, 1874, near the house of Theodoric Snuffer, not far from Roscoe. They were conversing in a low tone of voice, calculating the probabilities of finding the Youngers either at Snuffer's or in Roscoe. They were startled by a more sudden acquaintance with the Youngers than they had anticipated. John and James Younger had seen them from the window of Snuffer's house, and instead of hiding or seeking to escape they boldly determined to go out and meet them and dare them to their worst. So making a short detour they overtook these searching men on the Chalk Level road. By this time Wright had left his companions and ridden ahead. Approaching Lull and Daniels from the rear, the elder of the brothers called out in a commanding tone of voice:

"Halt! Hold up your hands!" At the same time the two brothers presented their double-barrel shot guns full at the breasts of their would-be captors.

"You d—d detectives, you thought you were not known." said Jim. "Now drop your pistols this moment, or by g—d we'll fire on you."

Without a moment's delay the detectives dropped their pistol belts in the road. James Younger then dismounted, having his brother John to keep their foes at bay with his gun while he secured the weapons that had just been thrown down at his command.

For a moment John, for some inconceivable reason, lowered his gun. That act sealed his doom. Captain Lull took advantage of the moment and fired from a revolver which he had concealed in his bosom. The shot took deadly effect in John Younger's neck, severing the carotid artery. With a wild yell and the look of a demon, John fired a fatal retort to his adversary, and John Younger and Captain Lull both fell dead from their horses in the same moment. Daniels fired at James from a concealed revolver; a slight flesh wound was the result. James, half mad with pain and desperate at the sight of his dead brother, rushed like a tiger after Daniels, who was making for the woods. He sent a bullet crushing through his neck and had the felicity of seeing him fall dead from his horse. Wright, the St. Louis "fly cop," had dashed ahead at the first cry of "Halt!" and had so spared his precious life.

James was in an uncontrollable agony because of his dead brother. He madly kissed his cold, blood-stained form, and swore that he would have a life for every drop of John's blood. He took the pistols John had used in so many fatal frays, and leaving to his friend Theodoric Snuffer the charge of John's funeral, he rode away, sad and solitary and brooding vengeance, to the house of a well tried friend in Boone County, Arkansas, there to plan future acts.

CHAPTER XXV.

WICHER, OF CHICAGO

JOHN W. WICHER, OF CHICAGO—PINKERTON'S COOLEST, BRAVEST MAN—ON THE TRACK OF JESSE JAMES—JIM LATCHE SPOTS THE DETECTIVE AT LIBERTY—WICHER TURNED TRAMP—JESSE AND WICHER FACE TO FACE—“I WANT FARM WORK TO DO”—WICHER'S LAST RIDE—TORTURE AND DEATH.

The position of a detective is not to be greatly envied. Apart from the peril that attends his work, he occupies an anomalous position in society. Nobody makes a warm bosom friend of a detective. Howsoever successful he may be in the discharge of his duty, he can hardly hope to be a favorite amongst men or an ornament to society. He may succeed in hiding his calling from the common gaze and walk amongst men apparently “unknowing and unknown,” but the timid and the cautious who have no need in the world to be afraid will always fight shy of the detective. He is a sort of necessary evil in the present state of society. Not infrequently, however, the members of this order have proved themselves to be men of downright bravery, as well as shrewd and sagacious observers of men and nature.

The history and experiences of Pinkerton's detective force is full of romance, and in that remarkable body of men there are wonderful combinations of character. Courage and cunning, reticence and freedom, a perfect knowledge of human nature, an eye to see clear through men and things and to understand the hidden and mysterious relations of the commonest events.

"Guess you detectives can see through a ladder as well as most folks!" was the naive observation of a gentleman who was introduced to two or three of Pinkerton's men.

"That's so," replied one of the detectives, "and what's more, we have to see through a ladder when there isn't one, and worst of all we have to climb it too, to the peril of our necks."

John W. Wicher, of Chicago, was one of Pinkerton's best men. He was scarcely thirty years old, and yet he had won a reputation amongst the brave and daring, as one of the coolest of them all. He was never excited, never in a hurry; but once set to a task he followed it calmly and doggedly to the end. Mr. William Pinkerton regarded Wicher as one of his most reliable and accomplished men. In any dangerous enterprise he would have selected Wicher as the most suitable man for a difficult and daring part.

Early in March, 1874, it was pretty well known that the James boys and others of the gang of robbers were in the neighborhood of Kearney, Clay County, Missouri. Indeed, it was believed that a number of them were staying at the house of Dr. Samuels. Being made aware of this, Wicher formed the determination to go and arrange for the capture of the gang, or at least of the ring leaders. Accordingly, on the 10th of March he entered the office of his chief in Chicago, and asked permission to start on his perilous journey. What plans Wicher had formed in his own mind will never be fully known. Mr. Pinkerton pointed out to his assistant the dangers before him, and from the first was reluctant to give his consent. So many brave men had fallen before the deadly bullets of these miscreants, that it seemed like running a terrible risk to go out single-handed in search of their whereabouts; and of all men Wicher was the last he wanted to lose. After a very long deliberation he consent, and on the following day the brave young detective left his young wife and happy home to enter on that last fatal enterprise.

Wicher went straight to Liberty, the county town of Clay county, some twelve or fourteen miles from Kearney, the home of Dr. Samuels. He first visited the Commercial Savings Bank, where he made certain deposits and made the object of his visit known to Mr. Adkins, the President of the bank, who, while applauding his purpose, still was by no means sanguine of the result.

“You little know what you are daring,” said the Bank President—who was just as anxious as anybody that this robber-band should be broken up—“I tell you a gang of devils would not be worse to meet than this crowd of blood-thirsty scoundrels who are led by Frank and Jesse James.”

Liberty was a small town, and a stranger would be sure to be noticed if he stayed long. There was an eye on the wary detective, more wary than his own. Jim Latche, fully aware that the hunt was up for his friends, the Jameses, noted the stranger at the bank. Something in his manner aroused suspicion, and Jim Latche watched with keen and ceaseless attention. From the bank he went to the house of ex-Sheriff Moss, little dreaming that he was being followed and watched. In vain that Mr. Moss urged him to return. He gave him a terrible account of the prowess of the desperadoes; told him of their shrewdness and of their merciless nature when excited by the presence of an enemy; and warned him that he need not hope to secure such wary men by strategem. Col. Moss was earnest in his efforts to dissuade Wicher from making the rash attempt, but all entreaties were in vain. Wicher had started out and he would not return without having made a trial. He determined to assume the role of a tramp and apply for farm work. Before he left Liberty he changed his clothes for those of a farm laborer. Latche saw this, and this was enough. Away he sped to Kearney and gave Jesse James timely warning.

Never did man walk more deliberately into his grave than did Detective Wicher that bright spring afternoon. Jesse James, Jim Anderson and Bradley Collins were all on the alert. The afternoon train brought Wicher to Kearney, and with a bundle swung on a stick in true tramp style he took his way, without suspicion of danger, towards the Samuels' homestead. The three desperadoes who had resolved on their course of action were hiding by the roadside. When within half a mile of Dr. Samuels' home, Jesse suddenly confronted the somewhat astonished Wicher:

"Good evening, sir," said Wicher.

"Where in h—ll are you going?" responded the other.

"I am seeking work. Can you tell me where I can get some work on a farm?"

"No, not much, you don't want any either, you d—d thief. Old Pinkerton has already given you a job that will last you as long as you live, I reckon."

Wicher was taken aback, but he soon took in the whole situation. In a moment Jesse's pistol was brought to sight, and he laughed that scornful laugh that has no mercy in its tone. Wicher was not greatly perturbed, but saw at once the only possible chance was conciliation. That was the last card in his hand, but he played it in vain.

"Well, this is a singular adventure, I declare," said Wicher. "Now, why you should make such a mistake concerning me, is more than I can imagine. You are surely making sport of me. I tell you I know nothing of the persons of whom you speak, and why should you interrupt me? Let me go on, for I must find a place to stop to-night, anyhow."

Jesse James laughed outright. "What," said he, "were you doing at Liberty to-day? Why did you deposit money in the bank? What business did you have with Adkins and Moss? Where are the clothes you wore? Plotting to capture the James boys, eh?" and Jesse laughed aloud, and Jim Anderson and Fox, and another confederate of the Boys, came from their concealment, with pistols in hand. Poor Wicher saw this, and for the first time he fully realized the helplessness of his position.

Then Jesse James added in a merciless, swearing tone of voice, "Young man, we want to hear no more from you. We know you. Move but a finger and you die now. "Boys," he said, addressing Anderson and Fox, "I don't think it best to do the job here. It wouldn't take long, but for certain reasons I don't think this is the place. Shall we cross the river to-night?" The others answered they would if it was his pleasure.

All this time Wicher stood calm and silent. He was consciously facing the inevitable. At a command from Jesse his pistol was taken from him. And in the midst of their grim sport one of the boys on examining Wicher's hands, said:

"Damnd fine hands these for the hands of a farm laborer. You've not done much farm work of late, my beauty! But you've done all the work you'll ever do for Pinkerton or anybody else, my dear sir!"

The plans of the bandits were complete. Wicher was disarmed, and now he was bound by strong cords and a gag put in his mouth to keep him from raising an alarm.

Later on in the evening he was put upon a horse, his legs firmly tied under the horse's belly. Jesse James, Jim Anderson and Bradley Collins followed making up an awful procession. On they went hour after hour and the wretched man, gagged and bound, had his ears regaled with the detailed plan of his execution.

By three o'clock next morning they reached Blue Mills on the Missouri river, woke up the sleepy ferry man, and, under the pretense that they were on the track of horse thieves, they persuaded him to take them across the river. The ferry man obeyed and making some sort of gruff reference to the man who was gagged, they told him that he was one of the captured thieves. They had crossed the river, and in a dark copse in Jackson County the dreadful deed of murder was wrought.

Wicher was taken from the horse on which he had ridden his last sad ride, and bound to a tree. The gag was taken out of his mouth and then by a process of slow, awful torture, the wretched demons sought to extract from him some information concerning the plans of Pinkerton. But it was in vain. Wicher saw that death was before him and he determined not to speak. They cut and slashed him with their bowie-knives. They dragged his head down till his neck was nearly broken, but all was in vain; and when at last they saw that no amount of torture would induce him to speak, they finished their ghastly work. And amid sneer and jest and ribald taunt they sent one bullet crashing through his brain and another through his heart.

The first beams of a fair March morning were breaking through the tree-tops of the wood, when these wretches had completed their night's dreadful work. There was blood upon the young spring grass, and blood upon that young fair face of Wicher, but what of that! These bloodhounds were too much used to scenes like these to feel one thrill of pity. What cared they for the young wife made an untimely widow! It was life for life they said. They dragged his bloody, mutilated corpse out on to the highway that it might be a warning to all detectives who should dare to hunt the Jameses.

So ended the tragedy of Wicher's fruitless search.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE ASSAULT ON CASTLE JAMES.

LULL, DANIELS AND WICHER TO BE AVENGED—THE JAMES BOYS TO BE CAUGHT—THE ASSAULT ON THE SAMUELS' RESIDENCE—AN AWFUL SCENE OF FIRE AND BLOOD—FRANK AND JESSE STILL UNCAUGHT.

Captain Lull, Edward Daniels, and John W. Wicher, had all fallen victims before the men they went out to capture. A thousand mingling emotions stirred the minds of the public at large on the tidings of these shameful murderers. But in the minds of Pinkerton and the whole detective force, there was a bitter sense of humiliation mingling with sincere regret. Not only were they sad to lose such gallant comrades, but it seemed as if the skill and cunning of the whole detective force were as nothing when brought to play upon these daring robbers. The loss of these three brave men had made them sad, the defeat had driven them furious with rage and they swore to avenge the deaths of Lull, Daniels and Wicher, and to redeem the credit of the detective force.

A detective campaign was organized that was to put to an end forever the outrages of these wily brigands. William Pinkerton, a brother of the Chief Detective, was sent to Kansas City with five of the most trusted men of the force. All the plans were to be well and carefully laid, nothing was to be left to chance. Constant communication in cypher was kept with Chicago. As soon as Pinkerton arrived in Kansas City, the sheriff of Clay County was sent for, and it became abundantly clear that the detectives could reckon upon the sympathy and moral support of a very large proportion of the best citizens of the county. A careful watch was set about the Samuels' homestead, in which twelve trusty citizens were engaged, and reports were furnished hour by hour. It was arranged that none of the detectives were to be in the neighborhood of Kearney till the time had come to strike the decisive blow, the day for which was fixed January 25th, 1875. That cold wintry afternoon Frank and Jesse James were both seen in the front yard of the Samuels' residence. Of this fact there is no doubt for a single moment. The fact that they were there was telegraphed to Pinkerton, it was believed that the two young men would spend the evening under their mother's roof, it was, therefore, resolved under cover of the night to assault the house, which had long been called "Castle James," and secure both Frank and Jesse. But Frank and Jesse were never without friends and there can be little doubt that the whole scheme of Pinkerton had been communicated to the brothers. Whether there had been any betrayal of trust on the part of any one, or whether the schemers had been outwitted by some cunning secret friends of the boys, or whether a sort of devil's luck had made the boys restless, it is hard to tell. They had keen noses for a scent, and they may have smelt that there was danger in the air. Be this as it may, soon after nightfall on this memorable 25th of January, when all arrangements for their capture were perfected, when squads and posses of detectives and private citizens, were drawing a cordon round the ill-faded house, when a special train was on its way from Kansas City to Kearney with a large force to "make assurance doubly sure," Frank and Jesse saddled their horses, bade their respected parents a tender farewell and quickly rode away, without hindrance or molestation. None of the vigilant guards saw them depart, and when the hour fixed on for the attack came they were fifty miles away, quietly enjoying the evening in the house of a friend.

The assaulting party had no information that the birds had flown, but quietly and confidently they were drawing nearer and nearer to the house, sure as they thought of their prey, and determined to take them dead or alive.

At the hour of midnight the attack began. Nine well armed men from Pinkerton's force led the attack. Balls of tow saturated in coal oil and turpentine were carried along, and two heavy hand grenades with a 32-pound shell. It was not with-some fear that they marched to the attack. There had been so many surprises of terror, that to be met by a fierce and murderous repulse would only have been in keeping with the past history of the Jameses.

Two of the attacking party approached a window on the west side of the house, and in attempting to open it woke an old colored woman who had been for years a servant of the family. She gave an alarm at once. But the window was forced open and two balls of fire were thrown into the apartment. This brought all the inmates of the house in terror to this strange, unexpected scene. There were in the house Dr. and Mrs. Samuels, Miss Susie Samuels and some younger children. Instantly the room was filled with smoke and flame. The plan was to arrest Frank and Jesse the moment they should appear upon the scene, as was supposed they would be sure to do on the first sight of the threatening fire. All around the house were detectives and citizens with cocked pistols ready to challenge the boys to surrender, and if they would not to make an end of their miserable lives.

The young children screamed and wailed most piteously. Mrs. Samuels, true to her stern nature, began issuing commands and doing all that was possible to subdue the fire. Then followed a dastardly and shameful piece of business. One of the detectives flung a hand grenade into the room amongst the terrified women and screaming children. A dreadful explosion followed, and then screams of anguish and groans as of the dying. But the brigands made no sign. For the best of all reasons, they were fifty miles away.

The attacking party being pretty well satisfied by this time that neither Frank nor Jesse were there, and without waiting to see the result of their onslaught, turned their steps homeward. A more cowardly and ignoble ending of a carefully laid plot can scarcely be imagined. The hurling of that hand grenade was beyond all things wanton and cruel, and altogether unworthy of men with any sense of honor.

When the consternation within had somewhat subsided, Dr. Samuels lit a lamp, and there before him was a scene that utterly beggars description. There lay their little eight-year old son in the agonies of a painful death. The exploding shell had completely torn the boy's side away. Mrs. Samuels lay in a pool of blood, her left arm shattered and hanging helpless by her side. Susie and the poor old servant were both bleeding from desperate wounds. The scene was horrible. There was blood everywhere, and agonies and groans, and in the pale glimmer of the flickering lamp light the poor boy turned his pale face to his mother and with a great cry of anguish died.

It was a terrible night, that 25th of January, 1875! There was blundering and bungling on the one hand, and the most unwarrantable cruelty on the other. If Frank and Jesse had been home there would probably have been a very different record.

Years after when some one asked Mrs. Samuels if

Frank or Jesse were really home that night, she looked a very stern look at her questioner and said:

“Do you suppose that either Frank or Jesse would have been there and nobody killed?”

The funeral of the slaughtered child took place on the 28th of January. Mrs. Samuels had had her arm amputated and was not able to attend the funeral. But a great crowd attended the funeral, and that little coffin laid under the winter snow wrought a great change in the feelings of the citizens of Clay County

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE TIDE TURNS.

GENERAL JONES'S BILL—THE AMNESTY BILL FAILS—IF THE BILL HAD NOT FAILED WHAT THEN?— VENGEANCE—WHO KILLED DAN
ASKEW?

That terrible night at Kearney turned the tide of feeling in favor of Frank and Jesse James. There was not an inhabitant in Clay County but felt outraged by the conduct of the detectives and such of the citizens as had taken part in that night of terror. If the Missourians did not justify Frank and Jesse in their lawless courses, they felt disposed after the memorable 25th of January, 1865, to let them alone.

There were thousands of respectable people all over this western region who had no sympathy with the legal attempts made to hunt these men who were already outlawed. They believed that animosities engendered by the course the boys took in the late war had a great deal to do with the present action. And the fatal fray of the detectives at Kearney led finally to the introduction into the State Legislature of a bill granting immunity for all offenses committed during the war by Jesse W. James, Thomas Coleman Younger, Frank James, Robert Younger and James Younger, on the condition that they would return to their homes and quietly submit to such proceedings as might be instituted against them for acts alledged to have been committed by them since the war. General Jeff. Jones member for Callaway County, submitted the measure to Attorney-general John A. Hockaday, and then in a speech of great eloquence introduced it to the Legislature.

The following quotations will serve to indicate the perport and intent of the "Outlaw Amnesty Bill:"

WHEREAS, By the 4th section of the 11th Article of the Constitution of Missouri, all persons in the military service of the United States, or who acted under the authority thereof in this state, are relieved from all civil liability and all criminal punishment for all acts done by them since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1861 : and,

WHEREAS, By the 12th section of the said 11th Article of said Constitution, provision is made by which, under certain circumstances, may be seized, transported to, indicted, tried and punished in distant counties, any Confederate under ban of despotic displeasure, thereby contravening the Constitution of the United States and every principle of enlightened humanity; and,

WHEREAS, Such discrimination evinces a want of manly generosity and statesmanship on the part of the party imposing, and of courage and manhood on the part of the party submitting tamely thereto: and,

WHEREAS, Under the outlawry pronounced against Jesse W. James, Frank James, Coleman Younger, Robert Younger and others, who gallantly periled their lives and their all in defense of their principles, they are of necessity made desperate, driven as they are from the fields of honest industry, from their friends, their families, their homes and their country, they can know no law but the law of self-preservation, nor can have no respect for and feel no allegiance to a government which forces them to the very acts it professes to deprecate, and then offers a bounty for their apprehension, and arms foreign mercenaries with power to capture and kill them; and,

WHEREAS, Believing these men too brave to be mean, too generous to be revengeful, and too gallant and honorable to betray a friend or break a promise; and believing further that most, if not all of the offenses with which they are charged have been committed by others, and perhaps by those pretending to hunt them, or by their confederates; that their names are and have been used to divert suspicion from and thereby relieve the actual perpetrators; that the return of these men to their homes and friends would have the effect of greatly lessening crime in our state by turning public attention to the real criminals, and that common justice, sound policy and true statesmanship, alike demand that amnesty should be extended to all alike of both parties for all acts done or charged to have been done during the war; therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives, the Senate concurring therein:

That the Governor of the State be, and he is hereby requested to issue his proclamation notifying the said Jesse W. James, Frank James, Coleman Younger, Robert Younger and James Younger, and others, that full and complete amnesty and pardon will be granted them for all acts charged or committed by them during the late civil war, and inviting them peacefully to return to their respective homes in this state and there quietly to remain, submitting themselves to such proceedings as may be instituted against them by the courts for all offenses charged to have been committed since said war, promising and guaranteeing to them and each of them full protection and a fair trial therein, and that full protection shall be given them from the time of their entrance into the state and his notice thereof under said proclamation and invitation.

The bill was first introduced in March 1875. The bill was fully discussed by the committee on Criminal Jurisprudence. A majority of the committee agreed to recommend the bill to the House of Representatives. Near the close of the session of the 28th General Assembly it came up for its third reading. The debate was long and animated. General Jones wrought most nobly to see the bill pass. It was however defeated, and that act of the Democratic Legislature of Missouri was the practical ratification of Governor Silas Wordson's message of outlawry communicated to the 27th General Assembly.

The mark of Cain was branded afresh upon the brows of these outlaws. There was no mercy for them. But did they really crave such mercy as General Jones's bill would have afforded? Suppose the bill had passed they must then have surrendered, and all the robberies and murders since the close of the war would have been charged home upon them. And the result could only have been one of two things. Execution or imprisonment for life. And neither Frank nor Jesse James were anxious for either distinction.

And yet it has been averred again and again that the boys were most anxious for the passage of the bill. During the time in which the bill was under consideration they were exceedingly quiet. No robbery no depredation of any kind disturbed Missouri. It is further stated on what seems to be thoroughly reliable authority that the Jameses and the Youngers opened up communications with Governor Hardir and Attorney-General John A. Hockaday through the sheriff of Clay County. The precise nature of these communications is not known, but the friends of the boys declare that they were getting weary of the life they had lived and were really and sincerely anxious to enter the the paths of peace.

They had spent a whole decade, and that the best portion of their life in bloody conflict with society. They had robbed and murdered, and their ill-gotten gains had slipped speedily away. It may have been, we cannot tell, but if there had been a door opened for them to a new path in life, they might have gladly seized the opportunity of turning from their dreadful past and

Of their dead selves,
To nobler things.”

If the Amnesty bill had not failed! But it did fail. And its failure was a fresh pretext for the brigands to pursue their life of blood and pillage. They had received a permanent lease of outlawry, and now why should they care? Society had flung away the one chance of redeeming them. They were outlaws still, and they determined henceforth that it should go hard but they would fill the bill. Hunted as enemies of their fellows they threw up all the good resolves they had made. For to them

“The die now cast, their station known,
Fond expectation past;
The thorns which former days had sown,
To crops of late repentance grown,

Through which they toil'd at last;
While every care's a driving harm,
That helped to bear them down;
Which faded smiles no more could charm,
But every tear a winter storm,
And every look a frown."

They had been some time at bay, now they turned with fury on their foes and wrote broad and deep in their wild wayward hearts, the one word Vengeance! They had smitten men with whips, they would now use scorpions! And woe betide the men who dared to cross their path!

Mr. Daniel H. Askew was a flourishing farmer, and a much respected gentleman living near the Samuels' residence, in Clay County. His opinion as to the whole family living under Dr. Samuel's roof was anything but flattering. And he was one of those men who did not hesitate to give utterance to his views. He was believed to be a member of the posse which made the shameful attack on Castle James on that sad January night. Albeit he himself declared again and again that he had no share or part whatever in Pinkerton's raid. Still for reasons best known to themselves Frank and Jesse James both held Askew to be one of their inveterate foes, and felt persuaded from evidence they had obtained that Dan Askew had led the detective gang that had brought death and desolation to their home.

On the night of April 12th, 1875, and about 8 o'clock in the evening, Mr. Askew went after supper to a spring, about fifty yards from his house, for a bucket of water. It was moonlight, bright and clear. He returned from the spring, set the bucket in the porch, and was just in the act of taking a drink of the cool spring water, when three shots rang out in the still moonlit air and the ill-fated gentleman fell dead on his face on the porch of his home, with three bullets in his brain. The wife and daughter of the murdered man rushed out just in time to see three men come from the corner of the wood-pile, mount their horses and ride swiftly away.

Who killed Dan Askew?

That question can perhaps be never fully answered. There is very little doubt that the three men were Frank and Jesse James and Clell Miller. For a little later, the same night, three men answering to the above-named as far as could be well discovered in the moonlight, called at the house of Mr. Henry Sears, and summoned him to the door and said:

“See here, we have killed Dan Askew, and if any of his friends want to know who did the job, tell them detectives did it.”

Without a single scrap more evidence, the public concluded in their own minds that Frank and Jesse were the perpetrators of this last murder and the tide that had turned in their favor was beginning to flow back into its old channel.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE SAN ANTONIO STAGE.

PLUNDERING A BISHOP—A $3,000 HAUL—A BIG BONANZA AT MUNCIE—A TRAIN BOARDED—$30,000 IN GOLD DUST AND
$25,000 IN CASH.

After the death of Mr. Askew, the bandits, fearing a general rising against them,—for Mr. Askew was a general favorite throughout the whole district of western Missouri—thought it best to relieve the State of their presence for a little while, and beside, funds running low, it was felt desirable to seek for the replenishment of their resources in greener fields and pastures new.

Accordingly, after having spent a little time in the Indian Territory, they resolved to journey into Texas and try their luck among the rangers of that wild prairie region. The select company of robbers whose exploits are now to be recorded was composed of the redoubtable Jesse James, Clell Miller, Jim Reed and Cole and Jim Younger, and another of the lawless band, probably Frank James. After a brief council of war, they agreed on robbing the mail that runs between San Antonio and Austin. They determined upon a spot on the highway about twenty-three miles south-west of Austin, and there lay in peaceful ambush awaiting the arrival of the stage coach.

There was quite a high-toned company on board the stage this 12th day of May, 1875. There was a real live bishop to start with, the Right Rev. Bishop Gregg, of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of Texas; Mr. Breckenridge, president of the First National bank of San Antonio; and other ladies and gentlemen of good standing—eleven in all. Merry, happy, souls who knew the brighter side of life, and knew no lack of earthly gear. It was as bright a May day as one would wish to see. The driver was in a splendid humor, and the horses seemed by their prancing necks and tossing manes to share the general brightness of the time. The stage called at its usual halting-place about six o'clock in order that man and beast might be refreshed. The sun was beginning to set as the journey was resumed, and the whole party, refreshed in mind as the result of being refreshed in body, fell into a pleasant conversation. The setting sun shone gloriously, flooding the landscape with unutterable splendors.

Just as the glories of the departing day were fading into the calmness and beauty of the solemn night, the driver descried ahead of him six mounted men, whom he took for rancheros; but as they drew nearer he became a little puzzled. They were mounted not on the rough mustang of the prairies, but on splen-aid American horses of the best breed. The driver became a little anxious, and said, half to himself, in language more expressive than grammatical:

His fears were soon realized, the foremost of the mounted gang, presenting a loaded pistol, cried out in a voice of thunder :

“Halt! D—n your soul, halt, or I’ll blow your brains out!”

Poor old Tony Weller never wished for an alibi for the immortal Pickwick half as earnestly as this San Antonio coachman wished for an alibi for himself in that unhappy moment. Of course he obeyed the command, and in less time than it takes to tell, the six robbers—three on each side—held the whole company of the stage under the cover of their pistols.

“Come, tumble out!” was the brief command, “Tumble out quick, if you don’t want to die where you sit.”

A scene of most admired confusion ensued. The women of the party lost all presence of mind, and without the slightest regard for the proprieties clambered over and clung to the gentlemen of the party for protection. Surely, never in this world, was a bishop hugged on the broad highway as that bishop was hugged by a very ponderous maiden lady, of a very certain age, as she begged him for the love of God to protect her from “those wicked, horrid men.”

But the bishop was more in danger than his stout-clinging friend. Indeed, there was little danger to the women of the company, if they would but keep quiet. Jesse James did most of the talking on the occasion, though Younger occasionally put in a word. The ladies were assured they had nothing to fear, it only the men behaved themselves. "Behaving themselves" on this occasion meant simply getting out of the stage and delivering all their possessions quietly.

"Come, tumble out or die!" was Jessie's brief command.

None of the company wanted to die. Not even the bishop. Heaven was no doubt much better than Texas, but they all preferred Texas for the present. They hoped to go to heaven in the distant future, but just then they preferred San Antonio to Paradise, even though they should get there with empty pockets. So the gentlemen tumbled out; and were ranged in a row, two of the robbers keeping guard with cocked pistols, while the others searched the baggage. After plundering the trunks and boxes of the passengers they turned their attention to the United States mail bags, from which a large sum of money was extracted. And now came the plunder of personal possessions.

"Gentlemen and ladies," said Jesse in a mock politeness, "it will be our painful duty now to trouble you for the money and jewelry you may chance to have about you."

"Do you mean to rob us?" asked the bishop in a tence of offended dignity, as he gazed on the scene.

“Oh! fie, fie,” said the shocked young robber, “you shouldn’t use such ugly language! Rob you! Oh! never, never! We would scorn the action! Do we look like robbers? No, gentlemen, we only wish to relieve you of a burden—that’s all, old sock; so out with your money, and quick, we have no time to spare.”

“Don’t you call that robbery?” asked the bishop.

“Come, now, old coon! Dry up, or you’ll not have an opportunity to ask any more nonsensical questions. Hand out your money.”

The bishop reluctantly complied, handing out his pocket-book.

“Now that watch of yours!” Jesse further commanded.

“What! Will you not allow me to keep my watch? It is a gift and dearly prized. You would not rob an humble minister of Christ of his time-piece, would you?” queried the bishop, in plaintive tones.

“Hand over that watch,” said Jesse, growing impatient. “You must pay the full toll.”

“You would not rob a minister of the gospel of a cherished, gift, would you?” he asked, most piteously.

“What! you are a parson, are you? A meek shepherd, are you? A poor, unworthy vessel!” said Jesse, with a sneer. “So much the more reason you should pay. You have no need of a watch. Get you camels-hair, and that sort of thing.”

Jesse's remembrances of the old days of his father's struggling ministry were revived. He remembered the hard conflict his father had with pecuniary difficulties. He had often heard stories of that hard fight and he had no large place of sympathy for well-to-do, well-clad, sleek ecclesiastics. So he taunted the bishop further.—

“Look here, my reverend old buck, Jesus Christ didn't have any watch, and he didn't ride in stages, either. He walked about to do his Father's will, and wasn't arrayed in fine clothes, and didn't fare sumptuously every day. What use has a preacher for a watch? Go and travel like the Master. Out with that watch! No more words—not one, mind you! We are not Christians, we are Philistines.”

Most reluctantly the Bishop gave up the valuable time-piece, which he valued above all price as the gift of loved and trusting friends.

“If you've anything more, out with it and quick, I'm wasting time” cried Jesse, growing angry, in real earnest.

The bishop declared that he had not; but Cole Younger thought it better that he should be searched, urging as the argument for such a proceeding that “You could never trust these d——d canting Christians in an affair of honor.” The bishop submitted to the search with a groan, but nothing of value being found on him he was let go.

The eight gentlemen were all searched, but very little was obtained till they came to Mr. Breckenridge, of the San Antonio Bank. He proved to be a big bonanza. They obtained from him over $1,000. The ladies were ordered to yield up their treasures. One was old and evidently poor. They examined her pocket-book, and Jesse said:

“Madam, is that all you have?”

“Every cent I have in the world,” she replied.

“To Houston, sir.”

“Well then, take your money, we won't trouble you.”

To her intense surprise the affrighted old lady found, when she got home, that Jesse had slipped a twenty-dollar bill into her poorly furnished pocket-book; and she was wont to say in after years:

“Well, well, the boys were bad enough, Heaven knows; but they might have been a good deal worse.”

From the other two ladies they took their possessions. From the fat old maid, who had clasped the bishop to her throbbing breast, they took a valuable gold watch and about a hundred dollars in cash.

They were nearly two hours at their task, but they were never molested, and not one of that company offered any sign of resistance. They made a haul of about $3,500. They took the lead-span of horses, enjoined strict silence and secrecy on those whom they had robbed, and then rode away into the dark and silent night.

The San Antonio stage rumbled on a sad, dispirited and poverty-stricken party. They were all of them philosophers enough to see that things might have been much worse. They had saved their lives at the cost of their possessions, and on the whole they settled down to the view that they might have made a much worse bargain.

The scene changes. Some months have passed away, the $3,500 of the San Antonio stage robbery have dwindled down and "financial exigences"—to put no finer point upon it—have lead the boys to hold a "Committee of Ways and Means!" Jesse James, Arthur McCoy, Cole and Bob Younger, Clell Miller and Bill McDaniels hold a council.

It has come to the knowledge of this select company of robbers—how, deponent sayeth not—that the government intended to send a large shipment of gold dust eastward from Denver by the Kansas Pacific Railroad. There can be little doubt that some of these robbers had friends somewhere among the railway or mint agents; but if they had, the secret was well kept. Anyway, the robbers knew that there was to be a very large shipment at a certain date not long hence, so from Texas the boys journeyed northward through the Indian territory to Kansas.

About six miles from Kansas City, in Wyandotte county, is a little wayside station called Muncie; a quiet little station all alone in the hills, with no dwelling place for miles around. There was a large water tank here where the train generally stayed for water; but for this fact, and for its association with one of the most daring and successful of robberies, the name of Muncie might never have been heard. It was May, the time of flowers and perfume, of golden corn fields and summer's smiling reign when the last exploit took place. Since then the autumnal fields had all been reaped and the autumn leaves had fallen, and now the stars of Christmas were burning in the bright December sky of 1875. It was quite dark when the train reached Muncie Station. As the train halted at the water tank there was a low, shrill whistle, and just a whispered word from Jesse:

"Now, boys! Quick, and quiet, and steady!" That was all; and instantly the train was boarded. Bill McDaniels held the engineer and fireman under charge of two pistols, and swore if they as much as "winked an eye-brow" he would shoot them dead.

The robbers then rushed through the cars, commanding the passengers to keep their seats and be silent or death would be instantly their portion. Two of the band stood on the platform of the cars, with cocked pistols, keeping, each of them, guard on two doors. In the meantime the remaining three rushed to the baggage car. The express messenger was overpowered, and in less time than it takes to write the story the van was sacked, and the wild robbers in less than fifteen minutes had possessed themselves of thirty thousand dollars worth of gold dust, and silver and other valuables to the extent of $25,000 more, and were riding away into the dark winter's night.

They had stolen in that brief space of time, without the slightest effort at resistance, fifty-five thousand dollars! and not one cent of that huge sum was ever got back again, nor were one of the robbers ever arrested on the charge of complicity in this affair.

Of course they were vigorously pursued, and of course they were not caught! And after all there is no great wonder. It was a good deal safer to put their heads in a lion's mouth, than to be found within range of the unerring pistols of the Jameses or the Youngers, or the desperate Clell Miller!

Some days after Bill McDaniels was arrested in Kansas City for being drunk, and there were found in his possession a sheep-skin bag and a large sum of money, these he swore he had honestly earned in Colorado. But these possessions looked very suspicious, and he was removed to Lawrence, Kansas, to await his trial. The ill-fated Lawrence that Quantrell and his band so utterly destroyed; when the old black flag was flying, and Jim Lane and his Jayhawkers had to be avenged. Con O'Hara, a clever detective, was detailed to pump Bill and get him to squeal about the Muncie affair. But Con's hydraulic powers failed.

"Did he budge?" said O'Hara's chief.

"Divil a bit!" said Con, "coaxing and threatening, it was all the same, he was as ignorant as a pig and as dumb as Ailsa Craig!"

Being taken from the calaboose at Lawrence for trial, Bill managed to escape. And for a whole week he was hiding in the woods. At last a citizen named Banermann fired a fatal shot and McDaniels lay mortally wounded. But even in death he was true to his partners in guilt, and would not devulge a single name or clue to make plain the mystery of Muncie's successful raid.

The robber-gang was highly incensed at Bill McDaniels for allowing himself to be taken, and to be taken drunk, but after his fidelity, even in death, they wiped out the memory of his folly. And sitting one night soon after in their safe retreat, they spoke of him only what they thought was praiseworthy. If it had been a genuine Irish wake, they could not have been more profuse in their compliments, and as the night went on

Each one said

“Something good of the boy who was dead.”

And last of all Jesse charged his comrades to fill a bumper and half-grimly, half-sadly said:

“D——n it boys, he was a brick after all, so here's to Bill McDaniels, wherever he is,” added Jesse with a strange half solemn look, “he was game to the last! and died without a squeal! Here's to Bill!”

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE WAR CARRIED INTO VIRGINIA.

HALF AN HOUR AT HUNTINGDON—ANOTHER BANK ROB-BED—$10,000 IN THIRTY MINUTES—A FOUR WEEKS' HUNT—TOM MCDANIELS KILLED—JACK KEEN CAPTURED.

There is a very fair adage that claims that even the devil should have his due. It is believed that even he may be painted just a shade darker than he is. Weakly wicked people are wont to roll up pious eyes and lay the charge of their miserable follies at Satan's door. This gang of murderers and robbers whose strange history we are tracing, was bad enough, but the Jameses and the Youngers did not do all the shooting and plundering that was done in the United States. Probably many things have been laid to their charge of which they were entirely guiltless. One offence is charged to them which they could not have committed.

A robbery was committed at the classic little town of Corinth, Alcorn County, Mississippi. Now between Corinth and Muncie many hundreds of miles intervene. And it is impossible that the James boys could be at Muncie and Corinth on the same day. That they were at the Muncie affair is beyond any reasonable doubt. The allegation that they were at Corinth must therefore be utterly set aside, as a false charge against the Jameses at least. They may have planned the robbery, and their confreres may have executed their plans, but they themselves were certainly not at the Corinth raid.

The wild war however was carried into Virginia. In April 1876, Frank James, Cole Younger, Thomason McDaniels, a brother of the brave Bill McDaniels who took the secrets of his compatriots to a felon's grave—and a fellow with dark eyes and beetling brows named Jack Keen resolved upon raiding a bank and this time Western Virginia was made the field of their strange enterprise.

Huntingdon, a pretty little town sweetly embosomed amid the hills of Western Virginia, is situated on the Ohio river, in Cabell County, and is on the line of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad. The opening of the railway had given the little town of 3,000 inhabitants a new life. And the sleepy streets became quite animated by the vigor of a new commercial life. The Bank of Huntingdon was doing a brisk little business, and Mr. R. T. Oney the cashier was widely respected by all the citizens of the little thriving town.

On a bright spring day in 1876, the banker was conversing with a gentleman who had just made a deposit, the common talk of the day was the great Centennial Exposition, at Philadelphia, and the banker and his friend and customer were speculating as to what sort of an opening speech General Grant would make.

“Oh! he won't say much! He'll only say what he's told to say,” said the banker half sneeringly.

“Do you know” said the customer laughing “I think that's Grant's salvation. Whatever he owes to his valor as a soldier, he owes more to his reticence as a Statesman. I don't worship the General, but I have again and again admired the skill with which he manages to say nothing impressively.”

“You remind me” said the banker “of an amusing criticism I heard on Count Bismarck the last time I was at Cincinnati, a most enthusiastic German admirer of the great chancellor crowned his eulogium by declaring that Count Bismarck knew how to hold his tongue in six languages!”

So the conversation flowed on. It was two o'clock in the afternoon. Suddenly four men well mounted rode up Huntingdon street, they excited no attention, they made no special sign. Arrived at the bank, two of them dismounted and entered the bank. These were Frank James and Cole Younger. They covered the cashier and his customer with two pistols assuring them that their one chance for life was to keep quiet. The safe door was open, $10,000 in ready cash were speedily rolled into a bag brought for that purpose. With more threats, and with the assurance that to sound an alarm would only be to ring their own funeral knell;

the robbers mounted their horses and fled away to the fastnesses of the Virginia hills. Half an hour had sufficed for this romantic transaction! Time was not money to the robbers, it was more it was life! In thirty minutes they had gained $10,000. They could hardly have made it quicker in Wall St. or at the Chicago Board of Trade!

As the robbers rode away they saw the citizens were beginning to understand the state of affairs and as they went they kept firing right and left to intimidate any who might be disposed to stay their progress.

Before an hour had passed away the Sheriff at the head of twenty-five citizens set out in hot pursuit. The authorities of other counties were notified, and very soon the whole of that region became a hunting ground. Bligh the St. Louis detective was largely directing the search. Away the robbers sped into the hills and hiding places of eastern Kentucky and Tennessee. A hundred miles away from Huntingdon the man hunters sighted their prey. A parley was called and a terrific fight ensued. The runaways had been compelled to abandon their horses. In the fray a bullet found its way to Tom McDaniel's heart and stopped forever its wild pulsations!

That hunt lasted four weeks. Jack Keen was captured in Fentress County Tennessee, lodged in Cabell jail and afterwards sentenced to eight years imprisonment in the penitentiary, where he still resides.

The two leaders Frank James and Cole Younger were not captured, they escaped to the Indian Territory. The spoils not having been yet divided the two successful robbers bagged $5,000 each.

CHAPTER XXX.

THE ROCKY CUT SENSATION.

THE BOYS AT OTTERVILLE!—THE TRAIN ON THE LAMINE BRIDGE!—THE RED LIGHT—$17,000 IN AN HOUR!—AWAY INTO THE DARKNESS!—
KERRY APPEALS—“A GOOD
PEACHER!”—’FESSES
TOO MUCH!

After the escape from the Huntingdon raid Frank met his brother Jesse in the Indian Territory, and so far from being dismayed by their “Hair breadth ’scapes

T’ the imminent deadly breach,”

they seemed to be only encouraged to further wild adventures. The perils that would have filled timid minds with fear and dread, seemed to be to these boys a perfect inspiration. They were playing a high game, they had made great hauls, and the glitter of the gold made them disposed to underestimate the perils that thickened about them and increased with every wild raid.

A long and carefully prepared plot was now arranged for the wrecking of an express train. The gang was increasing, but this increase was not without some disadvantages. The larger number became unwieldy in management, the chances of arousing suspicion were greater, the chances of capture were increased; and when it came to the simplest of all questions, the dividing of the spoils, then it was found much easier to divide $10,000 among four than seven! Still, this gang set themselves to their perilous tasks—Bill Longley, Sam Bass, the Haskins and Moores of the Indian Territory, and last of all, Hobbs Kerry, a Texan ranger, who had all the wickedness but none of the pluck and endurance necessary to make a first-class villain. Kerry was never fit for any dangerous post, and the wonder is that he gained admission to the gang at all! He never did anything but hold the horses of the robbers, and when caught at last by his own drunken folly he gave his comrades shamefully away. The point determined on for this daring robbery was a little spot known as Rocky Cut, about four miles east of Otterville, in Pettis county, Missouri. At this Rocky Cut a huge bridge spanned the Lamine river, and a watchman was always kept in lonely guardianship of the bridge. The plan which so thoroughly succeeded, was to capture the watchman, show the red light when the train approached, and then as the train stopped board it, rob the express car, and then fly for life.

All the plans were most carefully and thoroughly digested. Nothing was left to chance or peradventure. The time fixed was July the 8th, 1876. The plan had been largely concocted in the fertile brain of Frank James, but Jesse was undoubtedly the leading spirit of its execution. As of old time the animals entered the ark in pairs, so on the afternoon of the 8th of July the gang gathered at the appointed rendezvous.

The robbers came along
Two by two;
There was Frank and Chell
And Jesse too:
And there was one more river to cross.

The rendezvous was about two miles east of the Lamine river. By sundown the whole posse had arrived. Hushed and silent they marched in that summer twilight, till they found within a hundred yards of the bridge a thick, dense copse crowded with trees in their richest foliage, and thick enough to be a safe and secure covert from all ordinary gaze. Here their horses were secured and left in charge of Bill Chadwell and Hobbs Kerry. It was now close upon nine o'clock. The business of securing the watchman was delegated to Chell Miller, Charlie Potts and Bob Younger. Accordingly they went down to the bridge between nine and ten o'clock. The watchman, hearing footsteps, cried out with voice as full of astonishment as command:

“Hello! who’s there? What do you want at this time o’night?”

With that he swung his lantern and stared into the faces of his late visitors, only to be terrified with the sight of a pair of heavy navy revolvers most uncomfortably near his venerable nose.

“What are you going to do with me?” asked the astonished watchman.

“You keep still, that’s all you have to do,” was the reply.

“But you ain’t going to hurt me?” he inquired.

“What do we want to hurt you for? We want that money on the train, that’s all we care for. So give up your lantern and come along and be quiet, and you’ll be all right! But if you’re fool enough to make a noise—why, lookee here!—smell o’ that!” and with this piece of good advice, Jesse put the muzzle of his revolver still nearer the old man’s nose.

The old man had passed the age when a man must be either a fool or a philosopher, and he had chosen the philosophic side, and therefore he gave everything up to the robbers, and seemed indeed much more disposed to oblige his late visitors than to cross or vex them. The poor old watchman was taken away into temporary captivity.

At a rocky cut, the rails were loosened and obstructions placed upon the track. The red lantern of the watchman was prepared and concealed, to be used at the proper moment, and all lay waiting for the game that must certainly fall into the trap so simply laid.

All was now ready, the danger signal was to be shown by Charlie Pitts. The robbers lay down in ambush, and scarcely spoke a word for nearly an hour.

At last the Missouri Pacific train with its costly freight came tearing along. The danger signal was hoisted, the train stopped and was immediately boarded by these masked robbers. The passengers were held in check by a robber at each door of the car, with loaded irons, threatening death if any of them should rise for one moment from their seats. It was now the uniform policy of the band to be satisfied with whatever was found in the express car. The robber-guards, therefore, were free to promise the passengers that if they sat still they should go on their way unmolested. The leaders of the work of plunder compelled the express messengers, under threats of instant death, to open the safe. The contents were then emptied into a leather sack, without which the boys never traveled.

The shrill whistle of Jesse James indicated that the job was done. The train was ordered forward. The robbers seized every moment of time, mounted their horses and rode away into the darkness of that Missourian summer night.

The whole transaction had hardly taken the space of one brief hour and the result was $17,000, besides jewelry and many valuables.

The robbers rode on in a southerly direction. The story of their bloodless exploit had been telegraphed all over the western states. The detectives of St. Louis, Kansas City, Chicago and even of the seaboard cities were all on the alert, but before the July sun rose on the morning of the 9th the robbers had ridden fifty miles, found a dark safe spot where they divided the spoils, and adjourned sine die. They went away in couples and for a time there seemed no clue to the identity of the robbers, save only the common sense clue, that only the Jameses and the Youngers were equal to such tasks—"Jesse James his mark"—was pretty plain on all these border raids.

Not one of the band was taken save Hobbs Kerry. And he first of all gave himself utterly away. Hobbs had been all along half rogue, whole beggar; hanging on to any skirts, dirty or clean, if it did but pay for the time. He finds himself now in unusual good luck. He had by a pure fluke, as far as he was concerned, come in for a big bonanza. The beggar was suddenly placed on horseback, and he took the usual ride!

Both the Jameses were worried about Hobbs Kerry. They didn't know him, and they were more than a little surprised that they had trusted him so far on so slight an acquaintance.

"If the cub should be caught, they might make him squeal," said Frank, thoughtfully.

"Time enough to worry about that when he's caught and squeals!" answered Jesse, who left all the business of borrowing trouble to his more sedate elder brother.

At the same time even Jesse could not wholly disguise from himself that he felt a little nervous about the "Cub."

Kerry had parted company from Pitts and Chadwell after fording the Grand River, and now flush with ready cash, he goes to Fort Scott in Kansas, and there arrays himself in gorgeous array, and begins to play the "fast young gentleman," which is only another name for the "perfect fool." He visited Fort Scott, Vinita, Parsons, Granby, and Joplin; and had a good time with the boys generally. And just as long as the "stamps" were on hand there were plenty of the boys ready to help him have his good time. It was women and whisky and cards, alternating with whisky and cards and women! For about six weeks he had "a high old time." Bagnios, gambling-hells, dance-houses, he squandered his ill-gotten money, and when the whisky was in he forgot to be mum! He was watched and betrayed. One of the many ladies of his acquaintance, who were willing to love him most devotedly nearly all the time his money lasted, sold him to a detective for a higher price. This was good, sound, political economy. Buying in the cheapest market and selling in the dearest. The "Cub" had nothing to complain of. The man who utterly gives himself away ought to think himself honored when anybody stoops to make a bargain of him. Hobbs Kerry was arrested through blabbing when the drink was in. And, of course, after cooling his heels a little he was quite ready to squeal. And as the detectives said he made "a good peach-er!" Like Topsy, who cries out, "Oh! golly, ain't I wicked," and then luxuriating in iniquity "'fesses' to faults of which she is utterly guiltless; so this poo' fool "'fessed" too much; until the shrewdest detect tive didn't know how much or how little of his wild story to believe. He certainly neither served his own cause nor harmed the James boys by his revelations.

Frank and Jesse denounced him as a fraud and declared all the story of the "danger signal" as born of a wild mad brain; and for some time they were thoroughly believed by thousands in the Western States. They had still hundreds of friends, and thoroughly disinterested friends, too.

Large rewards were offered for the robbers of the train at Otterville. The whole economy of detective forces were at work, Missouri, Arkansas, Kentucky and the Indian Territory were scoured for months. But not a dollar of the stolen money was ever found, nor one of the robbers caught, excepting Hobbs Kerry—the "Cub!"

CHAPTER XXXI.

A MINISTRY RECORD WILDER THAN ROMANCE.

THE ROBBERS IN COUNCIL—THE PLACE OF RAID DECIDED UPON—BILL CHADWELL TO BE GUIDE—THE TREBLE TRAGEDY OF NORTHFIELD—THE FATAL SEPT. 6TH, 1876!—HAYWARD SHOT DEAD—BUNKER WOUNDED—THE SCENE IN THE STREET—THE GALLANT DR. WHEELER—BILL CHADWELL AND CHARLEY PITTS KILLED—A BLACK THURSDAY FOR THE ROBBER BAND.

One of the reasons why the robbers were so successful in their raids, and especially successful in their escapes, was the fact that they were perfectly conversant with the country where their dark deeds were perpetrated. There was not a nook or corner in Western Missouri with which the James boys had not made themselves perfectly familiar. To say they knew Clay county like a book is to say very little; they knew it much more perfectly than the most diligent student ever knew a book! And so, when the work of blood or pillage was done, they knew just exactly which way to take for safety, without wasting time or going a mile out of their way. Swift horses, prompt action, and a thorough knowledge of the geography of the place, will account fully for many of their hair-breadth escapes.

The baffled and defeated detectives, who had shown but little sagacity, whatever zeal and courage they might possess, were beating chiefly about the bushes of Western Missouri. But they were beating to little purpose. They were no match for the wary robbers, either in baffling their plans or securing their capture after the murder was done or the plunder taken. Russelville, Gallatin, Corydon, Columbia, St. Genevieve, Gadshill and Muncie, were all unavenged! And people grew impatient! It seemed as if these robberies and murders should be hindered or the perpetrators captured.

“One of two things is clear,” said a Senator of Missouri; “either the detectives are in league with these outlaws or they are utterly incompetent to cope with them.”

And, speaking thus, he echoed a sentiment that was fast gaining ground. But it must not be forgotten that, while the robbers did everything quickly, they never did anything rashly. The plan once thoroughly and carefully considered, they struck the blow short, sharp and decisive. And before the echoes of that blow had died away they, like the witches in Macbeth, had

Not infrequently the detectives would be most diligently scouring one region of country when, to their surprise, just as they thought they had salted the tails of their wild birds, they heard of some daring trick of these ubiquitous devils five hundred miles in another direction.

It was, moreover, very remarkable that their means of communication were so perfect. It was scarcely possible for the hunters to make a move or plan a campaign without the robbers knowing all about it. At the time of which we are writing, the detectives held Missouri, Arkansas, Texas, Kentucky and Iowa under a kind of surveillance. And with this fact the James boys were perfectly well acquainted. Their redoubtable mother—their trusty and ablest ally—rendered them most efficient assistance in this direction. And now, tiring of inaction, as they always did after a brief space of rest and revelry, they held a council of war, to which the notorious Bill Chadwell was invited. The council was held in a forest in Clay county, not far from the house of Dr. Samuels; the whole plans were submitted to Mrs. Samuels and met with her approval. That strange, awful spirit of hatred that possessed her prior to the midnight raid upon her home; when her darling boy was killed, Susie wounded, and her own arm shattered, had grown in intensity. If she breathed vengeance against all detectives before, she now breathed vengeance doubly distilled. It was her boast, made over and over again:

“I hate all detectives as I hate the devil, and if I had my way I’d send them all where they belong before sundown!”

The reason for inviting Bill Chadwell, the notorious Minnesota horse-thief, to this council was to consult him as to the geographical characteristics of their new field of daring. In following his nefarious occupation, Chadwell had been compelled to ride through all the region over which they proposed to extend their visits. It was arranged, after a long consultation, that Chadwell should act as guide through the new paths of peril, that were destined to prove so fatal to the weird council which met in the light of the harvest moon, under the sombre shadows of the Missouri forest. Chadwell had many friends who could be relied upon if any danger came, to render assistance and shelter.

One of the motives that suggested that the outlaws should try their fortune in a northern direction was in order to utterly confuse the officers in pursuit of them. Moreover, the time was opportune. The grain growers were just disposing of their crops. The farmers were flush. There were plenty of funds in the banks. And the fact that Minnesota had heard of them only, and not seen them, and certainly had no anticipation of a visit from such illustrious adventurers, all seemed to speak in favor of the experiment.

The gang was made up of a double quartette of daring bravadoes! Frank and Jesse James, Coleman, Jim and Bob Younger, Charlie Pitts, Cheff Miller and Bill Chadwell, the latter acting as guide.

The place for assault was a matter of debate. Cole Younger, as was afterwards believed, was moved by his "good angel"—for even these men believed in their good and bad angels—in opposing for some inexplicable reason the raid into Minnesota. He would have preferred Canada, and said that London, Toronto and Montreal, or even Kingston, the city of the Ontario penitentiary, could by new and special methods be worked effectively. It was a law amongst the robbers that the majority in council ruled absolutely. Every one of them had the fullest opportunity of speech, but the vote once taken there was no appeal, and every man threw himself into the scheme with all enthusiasm.

Mankato was first thought of, but Bill Chadwell had a friend at Mankato whose information pointed in the direction of Northfield as a more likely theatre for their daring drama.

The band of eight divided themselves and took different ways. On the 3d of September they met at Mankato and completed their plans of robbing the Northfield Bank. Their place of rendezvous was the house of one of Chadwell's warmest friends. They came and held their council unnoticed and unknown. All was quiet, and not the least suspicion was abroad that any robbery was contemplated. There never was in all their previous adventures more promising auguries of success. But alas! alas!

Northfield is a pleasant little town on the line of the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, in the north-eastern division of Rice county. It has a population of some 2,500 souls. Its inhabitants are for the most part hardy pioneers or the sons of pioneers, and they have the reputation of being a thoroughly vigorous people who were not to be played with in any sense of the word. Chadwell was not unacquainted with their characteristics, for in his lawless career he had more than once had occasion to know the sturdy kind of stuff of which they were made. But the great prize was at the Northfield bank; that was, no doubt, much richer than the banks of St. Peter and Mankato. “Nothing venture, nothing win,” is a sort of devil’s logic that has lured many a man on to peril, and will do again. Everything was staked on Northfield, and the Northfieldians went about their business that bright Thursday morning, little dreaming what that day was to bring forth in their quiet, plodding little community.

Just about noon three strangers on horse-back came in from the north by the Dundas road and went and dined on the west side of the Cannon river, which flows through the village. During the dinner they were talking on politics generally, and one of the three offered to bet $100 on the result of the coming fall elections. These things were freely canvassed afterwards, but no special interest was excited more than would be by any ordinary strangers passing through the village.

The bank building was in the chief block on the public square. After their dinner these three strangers—who were Frank and Jesse James and Coleman Younger—tied up their horses nearly in front of the bank, and after a brief chat, which seemed to be of a most unimportant kind, they entered the bank. At this moment three fierce-looking men rode in mad haste over the east bridge into the village, yelling like demons, brandishing their revolvers and shooting wildly right and left, while two others came from the west in the same mad fashion, shooting out and commanding all people to go into their houses and keep quiet. Meantime a terrible tragedy was being transacted at the bank. The three brigands leapt over the counter and Frank James drew his knife and held it at the throat of Mr. J. L. Haywood, the cashier of the bank, demanding that he should at once open the safe.

“I will do no such thing,” said the brave cashier.

“Quick now,” said Jesse, “or you die like a dog!”

“I can’t help that,” said Mr. Haywood. “I will do my duty, if I die!”

“Then die,” said Jesse, and in less than a moment a bullet went wizzing through the cashier’s brain, and he fell instantly dead at his assassin’s feet.

“You, here,” said Cole Younger to Mr. A. E.

Bunker, the assistant cashier, "come and open this safe, or you see what your luck will be!" Bunker declared he did not know the combination, and with that made a bold dash and escaped through the back door; but as he was flying from the scene of death he received a bullet in his left shoulder. Mr. Frank Wilcox, the junior clerk, escaped without any molestation.

The robbers then searched for the cashier's money box, but they found nothing but a very small box half filled with nickels. This they scattered in grim disgust over the form of the dead cashier, who lay in a pool of blood. They pursued their search a little longer, when the strange excitement of the street arrested their attention.

A fearful scene met their gaze. Dr. Wheeler, a brave and courageous gentleman who occupied rooms immediately opposite the bank building, saw what was going on, and scaring up an old shotgun took deliberate aim at one of the mounted brigands and shot him through the heart, and Charlie Pitts, as great a curse in Texas as the James boys were in Missouri, gave one wild yell, and cried as he threw up his arms,—

"My god! Boys I'm done for!" and with an awful spasm of agony he fell head foremost upon his horse's neck, dead!

The valiant Dr. Wheeler fired again, and this time Bill Chadwell received the deadly message and rolled mortally wounded from his horse. He had just strength to groan out to one of his comrades:

“Take my revolvers, keep ’em for my sake,” and these were the last words of the greatest desperado and horse-thief ever raised in Minnesota.

Others now joined the fray. Mr. A. K. Manning, Joe Hyde and George Betts obtained guns and joined in the dreadful melee. Excitement ran wild. Another of the bandits was wounded and fell from his horse, which ran riderless out of the town, but one of his companions flung him across his horse and rode away with him. At this point a Mr. J. S. Alien, a brave and highly respected citizen, turned his steps toward the bank, but he was soon arrested with the threat: “D—n you turn back. I’ll blow your brains out if you squeal.”

Things had got to a horrible pass. Two of the robbers lay dead in the street, another was badly wounded, and Dr. Wheeler and Mr. Manning were both firing away with most admired zeal.

Northfield was turned into a perfect pandemonium. An eye witness of that awful scene says:

“It was as if hell was let loose, and men of ordinary quiet character sprung into demons in an hour!”

Frank and Jesse James and Cole Younger, coming out of the bank, took the whole situation in a moment, and leaped to their horses and fled from the awful scene. But quick as thought the insulted citizens of Northfield resolved on avenging themselves of these blood-thirsty cut throats, and with all speed fifty of them mounted and set off in hot pursuit.

It was indeed "Black Thursday" in the history of that lawless brood. Two of the leaders dead and a third wounded. But 'Bad begins and worse remains behind.'

The tragic raid into Minnesota did not exhaust all its dark and dread romance in the quiet town of Northfield. Over hill and dale and through forest and ravine the trail of blood was carried. To follow that trail will be our business in the next chapter.

FOUR HUNDRED HUNTING SIX!—THE PATHS DIVIDE!
—THE SAD END OF THE YOUNGERS AND CLELL MILLER — THE DREADFUL SWAMPS BY THE
OF THE JAMES BROTHERS.

The robbers had never known such an entire defeat as they suffered this Thursday, September the 6th. Hitherto from the days of Quantrell's Black Flag till now, victory seemed to be on their side. But now defeat of the most humiliating sort was theirs. They had not secured a cent from the Northfield Bank. The blood of the much respected Mr. Haywood was lying on the bank floor, crying to be avenged, and the whole populace was stirred to the deepest depths. Before the Jameses could leave the town there were fifty citizens mounted and ready for the pursuit. Chadwell and Pitts lay dead in the streets, but they had no time to take a last look at their cold faces! Away they sped, for there was danger in the air. And every moment of delay endangered them more and more.

Information of the murder and attempted robbery was spread far and wide, it thrilled along the telegraph wires, it was borne on every breeze, it was passed from lip to lip. There was but one topic of conversation in that whole region and that was concerning the tragedy at Northfield. In less than twenty-four hours, four hundred well armed citizens had formed themselves into a compact phalanx to rid the region of these murdering, plundering scoundrels! And it must be admitted that they were more successful than all the detective forces had ever been. Albeit they did not capture either Frank or Jesse James.

"These detectives," said one of the hunting party, "are always going to do something! They have a way of looking awfully wise and cunning. There's mystery enough in one smart detective to run a country, but its about all mystery. Darn them! If they were worth their salt poor Haywood wouldn't be lying in his coffin to-day."

"You're about right," said his companion, "the only way to take these men, is just to go and take them dead or alive! And, I for one, don't mean to come back till we've rid Minnesota of these shameless blacklegs!"

The tidings soon reached St. Paul, and Captain Macy, private secretary to Governor Pillsbury, offered under the instructions of the Governor a reward of $1,000 for each of the robbers, or $6,000 for the survivors of this band of men exceeding bold.

The bandits fled, but they found that the terrible news was ahead of them, and every way, and ford, and creek, was guarded by some volunteers who were set on their capture. They came to the little village of Shieldsville and they galloped through the long street, firing right and left and yelling like demons to secure for themselves a safe passage. On they passed into LeSeur County. Jim Younger was bleeding well-nigh to death and his blood trail served as a guide for the pursuers. It is averred but with what of truth if it is impossible to tell that Jesse James wanted to have Jim Younger killed, to put him out of awful misery and make their escape more sure. But this has an air of great improbability about it. For when the Youngers and the Jameses did part, they parted as friends, and the Youngers consigned to their comrades the custody of all their money and jewels, which would hardly have been the case if so wanton and cruel a proposition had been made.

The fugitives wandered on day after day and night after night, until at last their jaded and wearied horses had to be left, and for further purposes of safety they thought it best to proceed on foot. Bill Chadwell, who was their guide and to whom they trusted to pilot them through a new country, was lying dead at Northfield. And they were oftentimes at their wit's end through their ignorance of the geography of the country. They were afraid to turn lest the turn should land them into the lap of their enemies. After six days of this weary pilgrimage they came round by Mankato and hoped against hope that their pursuers were growing weary of the search, they came upon a farm house and begged a chicken—for they had lived chiefly on green corn for a week—but they had to fly, for they heard the shouts of people who were mad with excitement, because they thought they had the fugitives almost in their grasp. They were fired upon and both the Jameses were wounded somewhat seriously.

The day after this episode it was thought best that the company should divide. So Frank and Jesse went their way from the bottoms of the Blue Earth river, and the three Youngers and Clell Miller took another route.

We will follow now for a little the course of the weary, wounded, dispirited four! They had passed through the county of Blue Earth and were taking a westerly course into Watonwan County. They had traveled in and out a hundred and twenty-five miles since they had left Northfield, though they were but seventy-five miles away in a strait line. Their foes were fast closing round them. Their doom was sealed. They had lived on such vegetables as the field provided. They dared not light a fire if even they had the materials. They were ragged and torn and wounded and friendless. They had made war upon society for many long years and now the terrible time had come. The Nemesis was at hand! Sheriff McDonald tracked them to a dismal swamp near Madelin and now the poor bandits were fairly trapped! Hundreds against four! What could they do? But they fought to the last! A heavy ball came crashing through Jim Younger's jaw, the wail that broke from him was terrible, but not half as horrible as the awful sight he presented with the lower part of a sad face shot away. Still they fought on. Once again a terrible cry was heard above the reports of gun and pistol, and Clell Miller flung up his hands and cried.

"Oh! my God boy's I'm done! But don't give in!"

And with that, the dying bandit fell against a tree groaned once or twice and died!

Closer and closer the terrible network drew around the three struggling brothers. Worn and spent with travel and hunger and fatigue; and now riddled through and through with shots they fought while they could stand, and revealed that whatever faults they had, they had at least the courage and endurance that in a better cause would have made the world proud of their names. What might have been fame was now infamy!

The three boys were captured and were taken to Madelia, and there after months of suffering they were arraigned for trial at the Rice County court at Faribault. They were charged with murder. But under the counsel of their legal advisers they were persuaded to plead guilty as the only means of sparing their necks. They were sentenced to be confined in the State Penitentiary for the term of their natural lives. The iron gates of the grim prison of Stillwater swung back upon them in the brightness of an October morning! They are there still. Wiser and perhaps on the whole happier men than they were in their wild lawless days! Who can tell?

But what of the heroes of these pages? How were Frank and Jesse faring? After leaving the Youngers in the Blue Earth River bottoms they went into a perfect wilderness and were so completely surrounded by their pursuers that their escape seems to have been half miraculous. It is true they had had long years of experience in this direction. They had ten days of such horrible trial that one would think that once delivered from these perils, they would never have cared to venture in these ways again. They would hide behind a tree and hear three or four citizens pass within a yard of where they stood talking and declaring that they saw them only a moment ago. They lived on green corn and new potatoes. They could not make a fire, and they dare not if they could. They forded streams and swam rivers. They often managed by these means to cover up their tracks. At last they got out into the open country, they then ventured to buy a couple of horses, and they got a hearty meal at a poor woman's house whose husband had gone to hunt these dreadful murderers! They now lost no time but rode all night and began to hope that all danger was passed. But in this they were mistaken! On the border of Iowa they were met by seven armed but poorly mounted men. There was a most severe contest, and Frank received an ugly wound, but their old time skill on horseback came back to them, three of the seven were wounded, two were killed, and the brothers escaped. After this fierce and prolonged contest James and Jesse found themselves once again safe and sound in their old retreat in Jackson County.

But the robber-band was broken. The Youngers no more could carry on this strange war against society, and three of the ring leaders were dead. Northfield has never forgotten that terrible raid. The cashier Mr. Haywood had the largest funeral Northfield ever saw. The banks of the whole region contributed to a most handsome annuity for his heart-broken widow. The two wretches who were shot by Dr. Wheeler were laid in the jail and afterwards buried in a felon's grave. Prior to their burial hundreds out of a mere morbid curiosity came to see their dead bodies. And on the evening before they were interred a veiled woman pretending to be a relative of Bill Chadwell's brought wreaths of flowers and laid them on the dead. Captain Coleman Macy—than whom, a tenderer hearted gentleman did not live in Minnesota—was directing affairs at Governor Pillsbury's instructions, and when he saw these floral offerings on the cold breasts of the murderers, he became very greatly incensed, and said with mingled pain and anger in his eyes:—

“I know how to reverence death, and I know the proper ministry of flowers, but it a gross desecration to cover these hardened breasts with floral wreaths,” and with that Captain Macy tore the wreaths from the shameless dead and trampled them beneath his feet.

Years have passed away, but the Northfieldians love to tell how the bloodthirsty James and Younger gang were defeated, and the death of Mr. Haywood was avenged.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE JAMES BOYS AMONG THE MEXICANS.

THE FANDANGO AT MATAMORAS—FRANK AND JESSE POOR DANCERS—INTO THE RIO GRANDE—STIRRING TIMES NEAR CARMEN—THE NOONTIDE REST AT THE FOUNTAIN—THE BOLD AND SUCCESS-FUL RAID.

The fame and notoriety of the James boys was not confined to the Western States. Not only were their names signs of terror to Missourians and Kentuckians, and along the borders of Kansas and up the Indian Territory. But Mexican mothers frighten their children by the very mention of Frank and Jesse James! As far back as May, 1860, and just after the Gallatin Bank robbery, Frank and Jesse James made their way into Texas, and one day they rode well mounted into Matamoras. It was a gay season. What season is not gay to the light hearts of Mexicans? A fandango, a sort of ball on a small scale, was announced, and Frank and Jesse, nothing loth, resolved to see what was to be seen and have their share of the fun. The night came, and the hall was well filled with olive-eyed swarthy señoritas and gay looking hidalgos.

The band struck up and the fair Mexican damsels began to their graceful movements soon stirred the pulses of the robber brothers. They joined the festive dance. They were not celebrated as graceful dancers. And the intricate gyrations of the mazy Spanish dance was quite too much for them. No doubt they were clumsy. And their awkwardness would be all the more manifest when contrasted by the exquisite grace of every movement of their partners. The on-lookers were first amused, and then broke out in open ridicule, and laughed at Frank and Jesse and began to mimic with exaggerated contortions, the awkward dancing of the brothers.

Now, the boys could stand a good deal, but you were not to laugh at them. They were not very fastidious or exacting in their demands, but they would not stand being laughed at! So, quick as thought, down went one of the boldest, beneath the strong hand of Frank; in a moment a strongly-built Mexican struck Frank a blow on the cheek, which sent him spinning headlong into the ample laps of two Mexican maidens, much to their astonishment and disgust. This was no time to waver, so Jesse improved the moment by sending a bullet a journey through the brain of the Mexican who had struck his brother Frank. This stirred the Spanish blood, and what lovers, of the sanguinary would say, the fun began and the fighting was beautiful. Frank and Jesse made for the door, but their way was blocked by the furious and vengeful hidalgos. Stiletos gleamed and glittered. Frank and Jesse both were struck and stabbed. But stilettos are poor where revolvers come. These Mexicans kept the doorway for a time, but after the boys had used their pistols a few times, four Mexicans lay dead on the threshold, and six others were dreadfully wounded.

The Mexicans had blockaded that door, but the boys of Missouri raised that blockade! Just at the passage from the hall a vengeful Spaniard was aiming a deadly blow at Frank's heart, but Jesse intervened and lodged a bullet in the would-be-murderer's heart. He fell and struck the dagger in the floor as he fell. Escaping the room they made for their horses. Jesse ran first, but Frank was pursued by three of these hidalgos; Frank had seized a bludgeon on his way, and now turning at bay faced his followers, and with almost Herculean strength he laid the three Mexicans stunned and motionless at his feet. The boys got on their horses and rode away. But they were pursued, and there was nothing for it but to make a bold plunge for the Rio Grande, which they did and swam safely to the further shore.

They had paid a dollar at eight o'clock for a night's fun at the fandango. Jesse said, his face rippling with humor, spite of the pain of several stiletto wounds:

"Well, Frank, old boy, guess we got our dollar's worth of exciting amusement out of that gang?"

"You bet!" was Frank's laconic reply. The boys had to go into quarantine at a little town called Concapcion, here they remained under surgical care for three months, so perverse were the wounds they had received in the fandango at Matamoras, on the banks of the Rio Grande.

But years have passed by since the night plunge into the Rio Grande—years of strange and weird adventure—many a successful raid, and many a hair breadth escape—The exploits of Northfield and that terrible hunt that followed are just passed—of the eight who went into Minnesota on that fair September day, three have fired their last shots and are lying all untimely in a dishonored grave, and three are hidden away in the living grave of Stillwater's gloomy jail; and Frank and Jesse have escaped alone to tell the tale.

And now, in 1877, the dauntless pair are quietly living at the little village of Carmen, in the Northern part of the State of Chihuahua, Mexico. What purpose had they in settling down in this out of the way place, which seemed to be on the extreme edge of the borders of civilization? Let us be patient and we shall see.

This same quiet Carmen was on the highway of travel, and Mexican merchants and traders with their costly wares passed to and fro in their journeyings. Frank and Jesse had matured their plans and providence seemed to favor them, as it generally did. They have hitherto been remarkable examples of the dictum given by the immortal Shakespeare:

Rough hew them as we may.”

One fair May morning, six pack mules, each guided by a separate muleteer, and each mule bearing the glittering burden of 150 pounds of solid silver on his back, moved out of the city of Chihuahua. Beside these there were twelve men as a guard. In all, eighteen men to guard the precious treasure. All went well till they reached Carmen, and then two simple-minded, guileless-looking young Americans entered into general conversation with the guards, and by the Socratic method of gentle enquiry possessed themselves of the knowledge necessary to help them in due time to possess the silver. No Scotchman ever felt more attached to his “siller” than did these American young gentlemen at Carmen. Then our boys—for of course the reader understands that these quiet young men were Frank and Jesse James—assumed to make confidantes of these Mexican guards. They wanted to get back to the United States, but they had heard so much of the peril of the way that they were quite timid at taking the journey. What with Indians and guerrillas they were quite afraid to venture. Frank and Jesse had three other friends who were really in the same box with themselves. The chief of the guard was interviewed with a request that he would allow these young men who had been inspecting mines, to go under their escort for safety just across the perilous border, of course agreeing that if danger came they would fight in the interests of the guards and their treasure.

The chief consented, and so there started out next day from Carmen the procession of mules and their treasures and guards, and these five pious looking young gentlemen—goody-goody-looking enough to teach in Sunday school or exhort at a mission. And yet Mexico had not five such desperadoes from the North Fork to the most southerly sweep of the Rio Grande!

For two or three days they were watched, but soon all suspicion gave way to confidence. It was noon about the fifth day out, the cavalcade halted near a most refreshing fountain. The burdens were taken from the mules that they might graze at leisure in the valley. The muleteers and guards, all save two—who were reserved to stand sentinel over the bags of silver—were enjoying their noonday siesta. The ingenious five were under a tree apart, holding quiet converse. The whole guns of the party were stacked against a tree. The two guards on duty over the silver pouches were holding their guns in the most formal and careless manner over their shoulders.

The opportune moment had come!

“Let’s go, boys!” was the brief signal from Jesse, accompanied by his low, shrill whistle.

Crack! went a couple of pistols, and the two armed guards sank quivering to the earth, shot dead! The arms stacked against the tree were destroyed in less time than it takes to tell. The other guards were ordered to hold up their arms, and were at once disarmed. They then ordered the muleteers to put the bags of silver on the best mules. All the rest of the horses were shot. Then Frank and Jesse and their confreres rode off with their stolen treasure, threatening instant death to any one who dared to follow. The robbers bore their treasure into Texas, divided the spoils, and congratulated each other on the success of their enterprise.

Nine hundred pounds of silver! to be divided amongst five robbers! Not an ounce of the silver was ever traced to the robbers, nor were one of them ever brought to justice. The Mexican merchants would henceforth be most careful how they undertook the guardianship of innocent looking young American gentlemen.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

MORE MEXICAN ADVENTURES.

WOUNDING AND KILLING—BRIGANDS IN AMBUSH—MEETING AN OLD FRIEND—A FANDANGO AT MONCLOVA—THE FESTIVITIES DISTURBED.

There is a spot on the River of the North called Piedras Negras, which is known as the meeting place of all sorts of strange characters—brigands from the passes of the Sierra Madres; thieves from Matamoras; cut-throats from Saltilio; smugglers from all the border-line. And now to this appropriate region come the James brothers in the Spring of 1877. They both of them anticipated there would be, to use their own phrase, "plenty of fun," and in this supposition they were not destined to be mistaken. They soon got all the fun they wanted.

Riding leisurely together one day through one of the villages not far from Piedras Negras, they were observed by a number of Mexican raiders, who probably thought there was the chance for a good haul, and accordingly the enterprising Mexicans proposed to try their luck. The boys quickened their pace after they left the village, and soon found they were pursued by a dozen or more half drunken, howling Mexicans, who fired off pistols madly and wildly, as though to impress the young men who had ridden through their village what kind of dare-devils they had to deal with. To the utter dismay of this roystering troop, our boys, instead of flying in hot haste before them, deliberately turned round and faced their pursuers, and in a brief space four of the foremost of the rabble squad lay sprawling on the ground, with their right arms broken from the bullets of Frank and Jesse's pistols. They at once retreated to the village in hot haste, and Frank and Jesse, as if mad for mischief and heedless of peril, returned also. A regular fusilade ensued. Bullets rained upon them to their heart's content; they left two greasers dead upon the plaza as relics of their visit, and then passed on. That night, as they crossed a stream swollen by the rains of Spring, they were surprised by ten brigands in ambush on the opposite side of the bank. Fire was opened, and Jesse received a small wound in the left shoulder. This incited their anger, and the brothers charged into their hiding-place, and everyone fled, save one who lay stark and dead that night, a victim to his own folly and the sure aim of Frank James.

In the course of their wanderings they came to Monclova, a large town in Coahuila; and here, to their surprise, they met one of their old companions of the guerrilla days. He had turned after Quantrell's death to peaceful pursuits, and having become enamored of the bright piercing eyes of a Mexican girl, he had married and settled down to a quiet, happy life. But the sight of the James boys, and the sound of their voices, woke up a thousand pleasant memories. They talked of the old times, and sang the old songs, and fought the old battles over again, till the Mexican bride was alarmed to think how desperate a man she had married.

Now, it seems the one essential proof of Mexican kindness is to honor your friend who visits you with a fandango. Frank and Jesse nothing loth, on the promise that the grace and beauty of Monclova should adorn the scene, accepted the honor. The night came, and with the night the fandango. All was bright and gay and festive. Music discoursed its sweetest strains,

"And bright the lamps shone
O'er fair women and brave men."

The honored guests were summering in beauty's smiles, the host was charmed that all went so well, and the gentle hostess beamed and smiled complacently around. Indeed you might have thought you were on Fifth avenue, New York, or in some palatial mansion in Chicago rather than away on the Mexican border. All went well for a time, till the quick eye of Jesse thought he discovered a furtive glance in the eyes of two of the guests. A young lieutenant of the Mexican army and an American gentlemen from Matehuala were among the guests.

They were conversing in low tones and looked, as Jesse thought, strangely at Frank and himself. Frank was making love to a fair senorita, when Jesse called his attention to these signs of mischief. But Frank thought Jesse was making the best use of his imagination. Jesse began to think he had seen both these men before, and when after a little while this mysterious pair departed, he became more and more convinced that danger was brewing. And forewarned forearmed he advised Frank to be on the alert. He was not mistaken, these gentlemen both knew Frank and Jesse. Both men owed the boys a grudge, for one had lost a brother at their hands in 1865, and the other a friend not more than a year ago. Again, there was still an offer of fifty thousand dollars for their heads from the American authorities. Captain Macy still held Governor Pillsbury's offer good of one thousand dollars each for the capture of the bandits. There was money to be made, and fame and honor. So the authorities were at once addressed and in the dead of the night a muster was ordered and a detachment of some eighty was at once brought to the fandango. The place was thoroughly surrounded. When the festivities were at their gayest the doors were unceremoniously thrown open and a stately officer strode into the room, followed by a military guard.

A scene of indescribable confusion ensued. The men were astounded, the ladies were panic-stricken. The only calm people at the fandango were the two most concerned. The dancing ceased and the astonished musicians gazed on in utter amaze.

"Vat ish all dot, anyhow?" asked a musical German who hugged his violin as though it were his only child. Perhaps it was.

The officer marched up to Frank and Jesse and in the name of the Mexican Government, demanded their surrender. The brothers laughed derisively in the faces of the officers.

"Will you surrender peacefully?" he asked.

"Never!" was Frank's calm reply.

With that the officer motioned to his guards to move up.

"Stop!" It was Jesse's voice of command. The officer waved the guards to halt.

"We have a proposition to submit. Will you hear it?"

"If it means surrender, yes," replied the officer.

"It is this:" pursued Jesse, not appearing to notice the purport of the officer's reply, "allow these ladies here to retire, and we will discuss the question with you."

"I shall be compelled to take you by force," said the officer.

"Let the ladies retire, I say!" exclaimed Jesse James in a tone that betrayed his impatience.

The officer intimated that opposition was really useless. The house was surrounded. Yet he mortally hated to begin an affray in the presence of the ladies who were excited enough already. And probably if matters had gone to immediate issue would have flung themselves a fair bulwark of defense before the young American gentlemen, who had been so "awfully nice" all the evening, and who were now being so shamefully ill-used.

"Let the ladies retire!" repeated Jesse, as though he were commanding officer.

The ball-room was soon cleared of the fair ones.

"Now," said the officer, "lay down your pistols. I have an ample guard to enforce these orders. The house is surrounded; you cannot get away."

Before the sentence was well out of his mouth the officer lay dead at Jesse's feet, with a bullet lodged in his proud heart.

Quick as thought the guard started forward unable to realize that their leader was dead.

One, two, three! Sharp, short, and quick. A deafening report, three wiffs of smoke and three soldiers lying in pools of blood that flow from the fountains of their own hearts.

It was an awful sight! Were these men demons instead of men? All the evening they had been polite and gentle and bland. And now in two minutes four men lay dead at their feet, and they looked as if every man who thwarted them must suffer a like fate.

The guard became demoralized and fled. The boys now rushed for the street, the soldiers guarding the house fired, but they fired aimlessly in their wild confusion. And Frank and Jesse only received a few scratches.

In a little while the whole town was mad with excitement, and the wildest stories got abroad. All the ladies at the fandango had been remorselessly butchered by hireling murderers, the soldiers were all shot, and the work of massacre was going on. The wild stories grew and grew. The streets soon surged with a most excited crowd. The fire bells rung, the alarm drums beat at the barracks, the whole of the soldiery formed in line and marched to the scene of the disaster. Men, women, and children made the night hideous with their screams. The darkness was dense and favored the fugitives. Frank and Jesse reached their horses and while Monclova was hunting them about the region of the place of blood, they were “Over the hills and far away!”

And for some time, Frank and Jesse kept their abode in the mountains, and it was not till all was over and almost forgotten that they ventured to turn their faces from the scene of blood. Not that for one moment they held themselves culpable of any wrong. It was defensive warfare, and all is fair in love and war.

And, indeed, not a few felt some sort of sympathy with the robber boys. They felt sorry for the death of the soldiers, and concerning the chief officer, who was foremost in his desire for the arrest, they felt much as Hamlet felt concerning old Polonius—

The fair senoritas of Monclova were most enthusiastic in denunciation of the military.

“Gentlemen and soldiers indeed! A little more of the gentleman would’nt have harmed them! They ought to have known a little better than accept the hospitality of a gentleman and then turn his fandango into an opportunity of miserable arrest. And as for courage! Well, the two young American gentlemen—and they were gentlemen—had proved themselves as courageous as your soldiers were though they did not wear soldier’s clothes.”

And so the fair ones babbled on. “They were just delighted, that the poor boys had escaped, so they were.”

And so Frank and Jesse dug four graves in Monclova. Though it must be admitted they did not invite the fray.

CHAPTER XXXV.

BORDER CATTLE THIEVES—FRANK AND JESSE RAID FALACIO'S BAND—A DESPERATE FIGHT FOR LIFE—"I'VE GIVEN THE VULTURES WORK FOR TO-NIGHT."

Juan Fernando Palacio had won the fame of being the most blood-thirsty and relentless, of all that vile robber brood that infested the Piedras Negras, Eagle pass and Meir, on the upper Rio Grande. The James brothers were now to test their prowess alongside this notorious free-booter and his bloody-minded followers. He was the captain and guide of thirty daring unscrupulous men. The valley of the Pecos, where Frank and Jesse were now residing, was rich in flocks and herds, and it was the sole ambition of Palacio to sweep these herds from the peaceful vale and utterly discomfit the "cow boys" as he and his followers disdainfully called the dwellers in the Pecos.

The time for the stampede was fixed and assisted by a murderer, who rejoiced in the name Jesus Almonte, an outlaw from all civilized society; Palacio proposed to carry away all the cattle, and if the cow-boys on the various ranches objected—well, cold lead and a short shrift. And the cold lead first. The stampede was complete. Three of the “cow boys” were killed but the herds were marched to the banks of the Rio Grande. Two days afterwards Frank and Jesse heard of this from one of the sorely distressed herdsmen. It so happened that Frank and Jesse had possessions in the valley and their flocks had been carried off by the murdering Mexicans. And of all men they were not the men to sit down and be robbed in silence. Their plans were soon formed. Prompt action was needed now. It was in October. Frank and Jesse soon got on Palacio’s trail. They came to El Paso, all was silent though the robbers had driven through the village. Palacio and Almonte came to camp in the mountains. They felt themselves quite secure and so fell asleep in fancied safety. But they had but little sleeping time. They were suddenly aroused by reports from the avenging pistols of the James boys. Shot after shot was fired dealing death at every discharge. Roused from the midst of a fitful sleep the robbers were dazed and bewildered and thought they were surrounded by a huge company of avengers, and so they fled as fast as their weary legs could carry them, giving themselves no time, for they were in no mood to examine the state of things. Ten of these robbers lay dead, and the rest terror-stricken had hurried away in wild confusion to the shelter of the hills. The leaders Palacio and Almonte were not with the camp when Frank and Jesse made their murderous onslaught. When the tidings reached them they of course imagined what the rest of the thirty thought, that there must be a company of avengers; or "Grino Diablas" as they called them, from the Pecos Vale. When they came to understand that this successful raid had been carried on by two men only, they were furious; and swore by all their gods to be avenged. The whole troop of the twenty-five were on the trail of the brothers to re-capture the cattle and strike death to the hearts of the graceless two who had wrought them such humiliation, and dissipated their band.

At last they came in sight of the great crowding herds of cattle and there were only these two men to deal with. Who would now give a pin's worth for the chances of either of the boys? And yet we have seen how again and again when their peril was the direst, they were the calmest. And so often have they rode straight up to the very jaws of death and return scathless, that they at least must not be buried even in our thought till they are quite dead. The boys had one advantage, they carried with them long range sixteen shot Winchester rifles. Five of the Mexicans, dead shots all of them, were detailed to finish these "impudent American devils!"

The boys had fastened themselves to their saddles, held their reins between their teeth, and dashed out to meet the furious fire. Their long range rifles saved them, each picked his man and in a moment the saddles were empty and two Mexicans fell dead.

The astonished three turned to flee away. But it was too late! Two more fell victims to the long range, and only one was left to go back and tell the story of their defeat.

So far they had been remarkably successful. But an imperfect success is worse sometimes than direct defeat. There must be twenty of that band not far away, and Jesse did not feel that the shouting time had come, they were still in the wood. So he quietly observed to Frank:

“I’ll ride to that swell over on the left to see what those other devils are doing.”

Arrived on the crest of the hill he saw fifteen of these greasers coming up the hill. They were four hundred yards away, but Jesse’s trusted long range Winchester did splendid service. One after another the Mexicans fell, till by the time Frank came up, four of the leaders and one of their mustangs lay dead, and the rest of the company had beat a retreat. As Frank reached the brow of the hill, Jesse said:

“How many are down?” asked Frank.

“Oh, only four men and one horse,” he answered, with a grim sort of smile.

And the rest of the valiant Mexican host were galloping away for dear life. But if they should return for a night attack! There was the true danger. For Mexicans may be human all the day, but they are devils at night! Frank and Jesse were in serious council when their attention was attracted to the westward, where some objects were seen.

“See,” said Frank, “away there on that ridge whose top the sun is gliding! Are those moving objects men on horseback, or a herd of buffaloes? What do you think?”

They raised their glasses and looked with patient care.

“They are mounted men,” said Jesse.

“Texans, Mexicans, Lipans or Commanches? Which do you say?” asked Frank.

Jesse looked awhile — the cavalcade, whatever it was, was two miles away — at last he broke forth:

“Soldiers, and Federal soldiers at that!—by Jehovah! Frank, my boy, I’ve seen the time when I wouldn’t like to have met such a crowd! But times are changed, we’ve been robbed, shamefully robbed, haven’t we old man?”

It did not take a minute’s consultation to determine the course to be taken. Jesse rode forward, sure that this was a troop of McKenzie’s soldiers out in search of Palacio’s band, and informed the leader of the troop, of the scandalous conduct of the greasers. At sight of this the remnant of the band fled, with McKenzie’s soldiers in hot pursuit.

The boys were left in undisputed charge of the cattle, which they drove back to the Pecos Valley. Jesse singing as he went along — “Wide is our home, boys,

 Freely we roam, boys.
 Merrily, merrily, o’er the brown lea;
 Brief though our life, boys,
 With peril rife, boys,
 Oh! it has wildness, and rapture and glee.”

In the eyes of the simple people of Pecos the boys came to be regarded in a most enviable light. They were the redressers of wrongs, they were the avengers of border brigands. And so the whirligig of time brings many changes.

CHAPTER XXXVI

ANOTHER ROMANCE OF THE PECOS VALLEY.

MEXICAN ROBBERS—THE FAIR ALICE GORDON—ON THE OTHER SIDE OF THE RIO GRANDE!—THE DEATH OF BUSTENADO—ALICE GORDON RESCUED!

“Panama’s maid may well look pale
When Risingham inspires the tale,
And Chile’s matrons long shall tame
The wayward child with Bertram’s name.”

It has already been hinted that Frank and Jesse James were winning quite a fair reputation in the Pecos valley. They were enterprising traders and graizers in the eyes of their neighbors, and not one of them would have dreamed that such inoffensive young men could ever have perpetrated such wild deeds as these pages record. They had acquired considerable property in the Pecos valley, which was well kept in charge. Their frequent and prolonged absence from home created not the smallest surprise. It was common enough in that region where life was as restless as it was primitive, for men to wander widely from their homes. Above all things, their fine blood horses were the admiration of the whole region.

On one occasion, after a prolonged absence, Frank and Jesse found on their return home that a brood of Mexican cattle robbers, under the lead of the infamous Bustenado, had crossed the Rio Grande and made a night raid among the herdsmen. The raid had been swift and well managed, and Bustenado and his tribe were fast making for the other side of the river.

A special element in this raid, that made it doubly atrocious, and just such a raid as the James' would feel they were called of Heaven to avenge, was the fact that the bold robbers had carried away the fair Alice Gordon, the pride and beauty of the vale.

Gordon, the father of the captured girl, was a Scotchman over seventy years of age, who had been overwhelmed by misfortune in the East; had become misanthropic, and who had sought relief from his troubles in the comparative solitude of the great plains where there was almost no society and where nature alone could charm him to something of contentment. His daughter Alice, a beautiful young lady of many accomplishments and of strong will, accompanied him. To the few rude men who sometimes sought the hospitality of Gordon, she was the embodiment of all the grace and beauty their imagination could picture, and there was none who would not ride and fight in her behalf without an instant's delay.

There was one and only one redeeming feature in this case. The robbers had not borne her captive alone, for they had taken also a most devoted and attached negro servant, Joe. Joe worshipped the beautiful Alice, and would readily have died for her. Little harm would come to Alice while Joe was near at hand. What their ultimate purpose was in capturing Alice it was hard to tell. She was captured and borne away from her home. That was the first practical fact. The next was, that she was to be rescued, and Frank and Jesse leapt to that task of rescue, as gallantly as the knights of old entered the lists for the ladies they loved.

On the morning of the third day's march Frank and Jesse came upon the objects of their search. They determined on an immediate attack. No waiting for the night. No waiting a moment longer than to take in the whole situation, and act with caution as well as promptitude. They were so to act as not to endanger the life of Alice, and yet to bring swift vengeance to the mean and dastardly Bustenado.

The robbers were eating breakfast when first the boys espied them. They were evidently enjoying themselves, laughing merrily over their exploits. The cattle were slaking their thirst at a neighboring spring. At a little distance from the rest Alice Gordon, wearied, sad and heart-broken, was sitting apart, her faithful attendant, the sable Joe, vainly imploring her to eat. The company of the Mexicans was composed of thirty well practiced robbers. The James boys only mustered six to follow their lead, but what had they not done with as small a number in the years that were gone? The command was given into the hands of Jesse. The little company of avengers had approached within sight. They were ready with their reins between their teeth, a loaded Colt's revolver in each hand. They only waited the word of command. At last it came. A wild yell from Jesse, and the eight sprang upon the unprepared greasers, and before the first awful fire of Jesse and his clan, half the Mexicans were killed. The rest, horrified, fled to regain their horses and decamp. The miserable Bustenado led the retreat, and as he gained his horse, with mean and dastard spirit he fired a parting shot aimed at Alice Gordon, who had fainted. His aim happily missed its mark. But Jesse, quick as thought, sent a bullet between his shoulders, and he fell upon his horses neck, as dead as a bag of sand. Not more than six of the company escaped, and they had the sad work to tell how the weird Americans had strewn the banks of the Rio Grande with the forms of some of the bravest sons of Mexico.

The cattle were turned homeward, and the rescued Alice Gordon sat upon her horse as gay as a queen, and headed the procession back to the vale of Pecos, where Frank and Jesse James are thought of to this day as brave, heroic men.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE ROBBERY AT BIG SPRINGS.

THE CAMPERS AT OGALLALA—$100,000 HAUL!—JIM BERRY AND THE BANDANAS—WHO WAS THE MYSTERIOUS UNKNOWN?

The scene changes once more. We are back from the land of the Pampas and the Aztecs and once more within the range of comparative civilization. Big Springs is the name of a railroad station about twenty-three miles west of Ogallala, between Keith and Cheyenne counties, Nebraska.

This quiet little spot unknown to any fame save the fine springs of water which gave it its name, was the scene of one of those remarkably successful train robberies with which the readers of these pages will by this time have grown familiar. This, indeed was one of the greatest and most daring of all the robberies.

It occurred a little after nightfall on the 17th of September, 1877. The train came from the Pacific slope, and was known to contain considerable treasure, and beside the treasure in gold, the train had on board a great crowd of very wealthy passengers. As the ill-fated train pulled up at Big Springs, seven men, with red bandana handkerchiefs over their heads and revolvers in their hands, came on board, ordering the passengers to be quiet if they valued their lives.

The safe in the express car had $62,000 in gold belonging to Wells, Fargo & Co., this the robber-gang quietly appropriated. Then two men well armed followed by a third who carried the ever-useful sack, went through the train and took from the affrighted passengers all their possessions. Not a life was taken, and only a few random shots were fired to assure the passengers that they meant business. It would be impossible to compute the gains of that wild raid, but they certainly could not fall far short of $100,000. The night's work clearly done, the raiders rode off to the plains and the train proceeded on its eastward course through Bovale to Ogallala.

Great excitement prevailed and suspicion at once fell on a number of so-called "stockmen," who were on their way from the pastures of the "Lone Star," with cattle for the Chicago market. These stockmen had encamped near Ogallala and had been there two or three days prior to the raid of the Pacific express. It transpired that this camping party consisted of an old guerrilla named Jim Berry from Missouri, Jack Davis of Fort Smith, Billy Heffridge, and Sam Bass. A mystery has always hung about the other two. One especially seems never to have been identified. He was often spoken of in this connection as the "mysterious unknown."

Those red bandanas gave the clue to the robbers. Jim Berry had bought those bandanas in Leach's store in Ogallala. This man Leach had done a little in the amateur detective business, and was anxious to make money and a name, and finding a piece of one of the bandanas in the camp which the "stockmen" had deserted at Ogallala, and knowing the goods to exactly correspond with the piece in his store from which those were cut which were sold to Jim Berry, he could hardly help following up so palpable a clue. He followed stealthily upon the track of these "stockmen" and saw them on one occasion dividing the spoils, but that was not his time to strike. He was specially intent on securing Jim Berry, the Missourian, who was known among guerillas as "the best man in Callaway County."

"The best man in Callaway" soon began to render his foes efficient service. He got to changing an unusual number of $20 gold pieces, wore very fine clothes, sported a fine gold watch and gave other manifest signs that he had made a great strike of some sort recently. Sheriff Glascock was urged by Leach to institute a thorough search for Berry. On Saturday evening, October 14th, 1877, he was caught in a wood by the sheriff. A sufficient guard was on the watch, and the sheriff gave this command:

"Boys, if you see him, halt him; if he shows fight, shoot him; if he runs, shoot him in the legs. Catch him, at all hazards."

The sheriff and his posse were lying in ambush

when Berry appeared, the sheriff fired but the shot went over the fugitive's head, but the next charge sent seven buck shots into Berry's left leg. The poor fellow brought thus to bay, begged that his foes would kill him outright. To this the sheriff gave no heed, but ordered that Berry be searched. His belt was found to contain five $500 packages of money, his pocket-book had in it $304 in all, $2,804 were found upon his person, besides jewelry. He was taken to a house not far away and a surgeon was sent for to attend to his wounds. Sheriff Glascock then went to the house of Berry. But Mrs. Berry knew nothing of her husband's movements or his whereabouts. She had not seen him for several days, thought perhaps he had left the country, was expecting to hear from him by every mail. The sheriff saw that Mrs. Barry was more than a match for him. He then pulled out the watch he had taken from the wounded man and asked her if she knew that, before she had time to reply the eldest girl cried out:

“Why, that's papa's watch!”

The whole story now dawned upon Mrs. Barry, that her husband was arrested. Her grief was uncontrollable. The sad wailings of the troubled wife and her five little girls and one boy were most pitiful. And yet in the midst of it all she paid a tribute to her husband's intrepid courage.

“And so you say Jim's taken!” said Mrs. Berry, looking sternly at the sheriff.

“Yes,” said the officer, and he then detailed the story of that Sunday morning's arrest to the wife.

"Well," said the brave woman, as if somewhat disappointed; "I never thought Jim would be taken alive, never!"

The house was searched but no valuables or money were found. Mrs. Berry at once hastened to the Ringo House, where her husband lay wounded and dying. The next day gangrene set in and for two days he suffered great torture; but his sorrows were cheered by the tender ministries of love. Mrs. Berry never left his side. On Tuesday evening Jim Berry, the "best man of Callaway," saw the sun set for the last time, the strange, stormy life came to a peaceful end; he breathed his last with his weary head pillowed on the aching heart of his devoted wife.

Of the seven men who robbed the train at Big Springs, four of them came to an untimely end in a very short space of time. But who was the mysterious unknown seventh? Was it Jesse James? Possibly! Probably! But this deponent sayeth not.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

ANOTHER RAILWAY RAID.

ANOTHER RAILWAY RAID—THE SOLDIERS OF GLENDALE—THE WHOLE POPULATION OF GLENDALE IMPRISONED—THE NIGHT EXPRESS FROM ST. LOUIS—$30,000 HAUL! IN SEARCH FOR THE ROBBERS!—A PLOT TO MURDER JESSE!—GEORGE W. SHEPHERD FIRES THE SHOT.

Since the direful tragedy of Northfield, Frank and Jesse James had left the Western borders of Missouri unblessed by their presence. For three years as we have seen they pursued a devious way amid the great wilds of Texas, and on the banks of the Rio Grande. It was hoped that their exile would be permanent. For though they still had many friends in Missouri and Kentucky, still even these were disposed to think that for these States and for themselves it would be well if the James Boys transferred themselves permanently to some distant scene. Three years seems a long or short period under differing circumstances. It was, however, quite long enough to give the Missourians ground to hope that now the reign of law and order was fully established in Missouri.

But in the Autumn days of 1879 this fond dream was utterly dispelled. When the newspapers of October the 8th announced far and wide that another of those terrible railway raids had successfully taken place, then it seemed as if the reign of law and order was to give place to the old reign of terror.

“Have you heard? Those merciless devils are back again, and busy at their old work!”

This was the common speech in the mouths of western border men in those bright October days of 1879.

Glendale is a lonely flag station in Lafayette County, Missouri and is on the Kansas City branch of the Chicago & Alton Railway. Its situation is most picturesque. The lofty dark hills, torn into clefts and glens and dales, no doubt suggested the name of Glendale. The whole region seemed to hint that a spare handful of Bonny Scotland had been cast on this far western scene.

Glendale, famous for its beauty and majestic surroundings, was not famous for an extensive population. There is the flag-station, a post-office and a general store connected with the post-office, but there is not so much as a blacksmith's shop, or a saloon. The male population of Glendale numbered six when the James boys took the census in October 1877. On the evening of the 7th of October in this year of grace 1877 the whole of the male population except the station agent were sitting outside the post-office store.

"It's a fine night, Mr. Anderson," said one of the compan

"Deed it is," added the postmaster who being a Scotchman was sparing even of his speech.

"But there's a storm brewing I'm thinking" added a third, who little knew what allegorical truth there was in his prognostication.

At this point a stranger suddenly made his appearance and tapping the somewhat astonished postmaster on the shoulder, said:

"I want you."

"What do you want?" asked the postmaster.

The new arrival did not deign to answer the question, but quietly stepped away, and said:

"Here, boys."

¶ In a minute—nay, a moment—half a dozen rough-looking men, muffled and masked, stood by his side, armed with huge pistols and wicked-looking knives. Their pistols they held cocked in their hands. Then the leader, in a harsh, grating voice, said:

"Now, take care, make tracks out of this!"

"Where are we to go?" asked the man who had just prophesied a storm.

"To the depot," was the brief answer. And so the little company filed off to the depot. There was Mr. McIntire the operator and agent, his venerable mother was in a room overhead and Mr. W. E. Bridges assistant auditor of the Chicago & Alton line was taking tea with Mrs. McIntire in the room over the office.

The leader of the masked men, for there were twelve of them now at the door of the depot, sauntered lazily into the office and said:

“I want to send a message to Chicago.”

“All right!” said Mr. McIntire. But before he was well aware, a heavy hand was laid on his arm and he was pulled back with the astonishing announcement.

“You are my prisoner.”

In a moment the instrument was torn from its place and rendered utterly useless. The instrument was smashed.

“Now,” said the leader, whose only mask was a long dark beard, “I want you to lower that green light!”

“But,” said the agent, “the train will stop if I do.”

“That’s the alum! precisely what we want it to do, my buck, and the sooner you obey orders the better. I will give you a minute to lower the light,” said the bearded leader, at the same time thrusting a cocked pistol to the face of the agent.

The operator could see the long, bright barrel of the pistol and yielded at discretion.

The order was obeyed with the reluctance with which a conscientious man puts his hand to such work, but the agent was powerless to resist, and he obeyed the order.

Before this was done he had been asked, “Anybody up stairs? Do you hear?” and he had answered truthfully that his mother was there, and that the traveling auditor of the road and she were taking tea when he came down.

One of the robbers mounted the stairs and soon relieved Mr. Bridges of his money and a handsome gold watch. Mrs. McIntire was almost frantic with fears for her son's safety, but was assured that he should not be harmed if he did as he was told.

The robbers now concealed themselves and waited for the train which was now at hand.

At the moment of its arrival two of the masked robbers rushed to the cab of the locomotive and demanded the coal hammer.

"What do you want with it?" asked the engineer.

"Never do you mind! Hand it here quick or you'll never have use for a hammer again!" was the response.

The hammer was yielded and soon was brought into requisition to break open the door of the express car which had been securely locked on the first faint gleam of danger by the messenger Mr. William Grimes. The faithful custodian of the express treasures had formed the plan of hiding the gold or escaping with it. He took most of the money out of the safe and hastily deposited it in a satchel which he carried with him. He swung the safe door too and was making for the further door of exit.

He was one moment too late! The robbers confronted him.

"Here you!" said one of them "give me the key of that d—d safe and quick!"

“I will not” said Grimes “take it if you want too!”

In a moment the faithful Grimes lay senseless on the floor from a blow from the butt end of a revolver. The safe was ransacked, the money in the satchel was taken and other valuables. The train had waited ten minutes at Glendale, but not for refreshments! During that brief space the sum of $35,000 to $40,000 had been stolen. The train was then ordered to proceed. The prisoners were released from the station house.

Before leaving, the leader of the gang gave Mr. Bridges a dispatch to send to the Kansas City Journal from the next station. It was dated Blue Springs, Missouri, and read: “We are the boys who are hard to handle, and we will make it hot for the boys who try to take us.” The dispatch was signed with the names of Frank and Jesse James, Jack Bishop, Jim Connors, Cool Carter and three others.

What the worth of that dispatch is it is hard to tell, but there is no moral doubt but that both Frank and Jesse James were engaged in this raid. Again and again it has been shown in these pages that where Frank was excellent in planning, Jesse was equally excellent in execution. No team of horses ever ran together in harness with more perfect harmony than Frank and Jesse ran together in their wild career of crime.

In this last work against peace and order, the black-bearded leader of the Glendale fray can hardly have been any other than Frank James.

Major James Liggett, of Kansas City, now set to work to discover the robbers. But cool of brain and brave of heart and most patient in the execution of every purpose, he set himself a task that was not easy of performance. In setting out to hunt the Jameses down he sat himself

The major saw no way of accomplishing his purpose by straightforward means, so he resolved to employ stratagem. George W. Shepherd, who had had a most checquered career, who belonged to the old guerrilla band in the days of Quantrell, who had been captured, sentenced to a term in the penitentiary, and had served that term and came out to find his trusty spouse had during his “durance vile” taken advantage of the divorce act, and was now the lawful wife of another. This shock and blow to Shepherd’s constant affections turned the tide of his life. He had promised the parson in the penitentiary that as soon as ever he was released he would begin a new course of life. All convicts do this, and probably George W. Shepherd meant to do so, just as seriously as all other convicts do.

But when he found himself so basely deserted by the wife of his bosom, saw all the hopes and dreams of his long prison years thus rudely cast aside, he gave up all faith in woman’s constancy, all trust in goodness, human and divine, and flinging the reins to the horses he sang,

The devil take the hindermost.”

For a good long time Shepherd was associated with the James boys, and more particularly with Jesse. It was through Shepherd that Major Liggett hoped to reach his prize. It would appear from all that can be gathered that Jesse, while in a general way he trusted Shepherd, still had misgivings more than once that if circumstances were more favorable to himself than to his comrades, he would look well to himself and leave his comrades to take care for themselves, but Jesse never thought Shepherd base enough for absolute betrayal.

Another element must be considered in this story. Shepherd had a nephew named Flannery, whose body was found murdered, and he was then robbed of $1000 in hard cash. Shepherd always charged this murder at the door of Jesse James and Jim Anderson. So there was in his mind a grudge against both Jesse and Jim Anderson.

It will be seen that Shepherd held an attitude toward Jesse that made him a ready tool in Leggit's hands. Shepherd had been working at a dry goods store. Leggit's plan was that Shepherd was to find out Jesse, tell him that it was no use trying to walk straight, the detectives were always shadowing him. He was to show bogus newspaper clippings to that effect, tell Jesse that he wanted to come back and join him, and then, at a convenient time, betray Jesse to his employers. Shepherd was to be provided with a horse and $50 a month till the job was done, and then the great rewards were to be divided.

That Shepherd killed Jim Anderson to be avenged of the death of his nephew is probably true. He took him to a lonely spot, accused him of a share in the murder and robbery, and gained a sort of half admission of the truth of the charge. He then drew instantly a keen polished blade, and swift as revenge he cut the throat of his quondam companion, and nearly tore his head from his body.

That Shepherd shot Jesse James too is also true. Jesse, we are told, fell from his horse, and Shepherd believing he had killed him, fled. But Jesse was not killed, as we shall see. This strange affray came off at Short Creek. Shepherd called out to Jesse, "D——n you, Jesse James, thirteen years ago you killed my nephew Frank," and with that he wheeled round and fired. And when, as he thought, the redoubtable Jesse was dead, he dashed away to parts unknown.

But Jesse was not mortally wounded, though the wound was an ugly one, and threatened to be fatal. For a long time Mrs. Samuels, Jesse's mother, believed him dead, or affected to believe so to put people off his track, which is much more probable.

This shooting took place in 1879. In April of last year—1880—a very large immigration convention took place in St. Louis. Jesse James—under another name of course—was a guest at the Lindell hotel. He enjoyed the best with the best. He was dressed in a dark suit and wore a soft felt hat. He was known and recognized by many old friends, though he maintained during his stay in St Louis the utmost reticence regarding himself and his comrades.

Jesse James is still a free rover! His shrewdness is unexampled, his resources are unlimited. What his future will be, who can tell?

CHAPTER XXXIX.

THE MAMMOTH CAVE STAGES.

THE LAST OF THE STAGE ROBBERIES—THE SOLITARY •LADY—CATALOGUE OF THE SWAG!—"GIVE MY LOVE TO THE GIRLS!"

The last daring feat of the highwaymanship attributed to the James brothers took place in September, 1880, after the following fashion:

The Mammoth Cave is the giant sight of Kentucky. Thousands on thousands flock year by year to gaze upon its mysteries and marvels. If less majestic it is not less wonderful than the world-renowned Falls of Niagara:

In the fall of the year tourists and pilgrims from all lands visit this famous scene. And as they are generally wealthy people who come they are supposed to carry about with them, as a rule, the "wherewithal" so necessary for the sight-seer in these regions. If they would see what is to be seen, they must heed Iago's advice to Roderigo:—

'Put money in thy purse.'

The well-lined corpulent pocket-books of these tourists have often proved a sore temptation to the robbers who sometimes infest that neighborhood.

One of the favorite routes to the cave is by the Louisville and Nashville railroad, to Cave City, and thence by the Concord stage to the cave, a run of some eight or ten miles. About half way between Cave City and the cave there is a dense wood, serving as an exquisite shade in the heat of the day, but as the shadows of evening fall, the whole region looks sombre and gloomy.

It was a little after 6 o'clock on Friday evening, September 3rd, 1880, that the Concord Cave-coach came rumbling along, carrying seven gentlemen and one lady. The coach had got well under the gloomy shadow of the wood, when the driver descried faintly two horsemen in the distance, he took little notice of them till they got nearer, the younger of the two suddenly cried: "Halt!"

And with that, presented a pair of revolvers at the driver's head and covered the whole stage. The driver pulled up and was ordered to the door of his coach. He saw at once whom he had to deal with. And by their peremptory manner as much as by their personal appearance, he knew the strangers to be Frank James and one of his gang, and begged his passengers, if they valued their lives, to yield to the highway men without a moment's resistance; arguing with an irresistible logic:

"You see, they'll have your money, anyhow, and if you bother 'em they'll have your life as well as your money."

“Come out of the stage, please,” said the rider who had first commanded the halt.

The order took the shape of the most polite request. The passengers looked through the open windows and saw the muzzles of two pair of revolvers, commanding the whole line of the stage. The passengers needed no further argument. Mr. R. S. Rountree, of the Milwaukee Evening Wisconsin, was wide awake to the importance of the hour, and managed to slip his gold watch and pocket-book under the cushion as he rose to leave the stage. Miss Rountree, daughter of the Hon. R. Rountree, of Lebanon, Ky., the only lady on board, was permitted to retain her seat. After the passengers were out and stood in single file, Frank James tossed his rein to his companion, who covered the whole line with his pistols, and then proceeded to search their pockets, while they were charged to hold up their hands and keep them up. There seems not to have been the first thought of resistance. How successful the raid was may be gathered from the following detailed Beside this they bagged about $200 worth of jewelry. When they were through with their examination and robbery, they generously returned the railway passes and tickets that were no manner of use in the world to them. Then with the utmost nonchalance they proceeded to explain that they were not robbers! Oh! dear, no, nothing so vulgar! They were only moonshiners who were unduly pressed by an unreasonable Government, were compelled to leave the country, and of course they could not go without money. And, therefore, though much against their principles, they were compelled to levy toll after this fashion. They were extremely sorry if they had given any undue annoyance. It might be some consolation to know that they had taken toll from the out-going coach that very afternoon, and Mr. George Crogham, one of the owners of the celebrated cave, had contributed the handsome sum of $700.

Turning to Mr. Craig, of Georgia, Frank said he hated worse than anything to take his money, for in the late war he had fought in a Georgia regiment himself, but then he had no option.

"You know, my dear sir," said Frank, with a smile, "Needs must when the devil drives."

Turning to the only lady of the party the impertinent robber enquired her name.

"Miss Rountree, of Lebanon," said the lady, scarcely able to hide her disgust.

"Indeed!" said Frank, his face quite lighting up with a smile, "why then you'll probably know some friends of mine. I have some very dear friends in Lebanon. Do you happen to know the Misses Smithers who live there?"

"Yes, sir, I do," replied Miss Rountree.

"Dear me," added Frank, "what a coincidence! Nice girls the Smithers' girls, ain't they? Real jolly girls! No nonsense, you know, but real out and outers! I wish you'd give my love to them when you see them. Tell them not to be afraid, I'll make all this right."

By this time the passengers were again in the stage and Frank ordered the driver to drive on, and as the old stage rumbled along he shouted a farewell request to Miss Rountree:

"Be sure and give my love to the girls!"

The old coach rumbled on to the great Mammoth Cave, its occupants were sad and morose and gloomy, their lightness of pocket accounting for their heaviness of heart.

But Frank James and James Cummings, heavy of pocket and light of heart, rode off in another direction.

CHAPTER XL.

THE LAST DARK DEEDS OF THE JAMES GANG.

MORE ROBBERY AND BLOOD SHED—WILLIAM WESTFALL AND J. MCMILLAN THE LAST VICTIMS OF THE BLOODY CONFEDERATION—THE DE-MORALIZED PASSENGERS.

After a period of comparative peace the old battlefield of the James and Younger brothers rings again the tocsin of alarm, another of those atrocious exploits that stain the pages of modern civilization and bring the blush of shame to every humane cheek.

America from Cape Cod to the Golden Gate and from the mountains to the sea, was in the throes of a great sorrow! In the midst of general and wide spread prosperity, when all went merry as a marriage-bell; the whole land was suddenly convulsed with a great horror at the dastardly attempt of a blood-thirsty assassin—in the person of Charles Jules Guiteau—to take the life of General James A. Garfield, President of the United States. On the second of July in the very heart of the smiling summer, this would be murderer, fired three shots at the unoffending Head of the Nation. The assassin giving this reason for his shameful deed, that the death of the President was necessary for the good of the Republican cause. Those shots resounded through the length and breadth of the great Republic. And the pages of history have no record to parallel the great agony of grief that America and subsequently the whole civilized world felt and manifested for her smitten wounded chief. Day by day and hour by hour the bulletins were waited and watched for with most intense anxiety. And just as relief came in the approaching convalescence of the illustrious sufferer; the ear and heart of Western America was startled and alarmed by the record of another of those murderers frays that were so common on the Western border line of Missouri years ago.

On a peaceful summer night, Friday July 15th 1881, the desperate attack took place; the tidings swept along the telegraph lines; and early the next morning the world was startled by the intelligence of the latest exploits of this bloody confederation. And once again the questions are being asked why cannot this wild band of men be suppressed? Are the laws of Missouri inadequate to meet the case? Or being equal to such emergencies, do the proper authorities tremble at the task of putting them into operation? Is Missouri or its western border to be the undisputed scene of wholesale plunder and cruel murder? The recent developments in a district of Ontario, Canada, in which religious factions and family feuds led to the notorious Biddulph murders, are bad enough in all conscience, but they are nota-ing compared to the twenty years of a reign of terror during which the Youngers and the Jameses have ruled; the red-handed murderous tyrants of Kansas and Missouri. The leading journals of the west are asking why the peaceful, law-abiding inhabitants of these regions do not rise and put an end to this state of things. They do not openly propose a vigilance committee, nor do they in as many words recommend a trial of the methods of Judge Lynch. But it is clear that the modus operandi would not greatly distress them, so long as this murderous James gang was once swept from the face of the earth.

On Friday evening, July 15th, 1881, the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific train left Kansas City, with its usual complement of passengers, but with a lighter treasure than usual, both in freight and bullion. Indeed there was not more than $2,000 of express money and a few bars of silver, which latter form no strong temptation to robbers, being too heavy for rapid transit. The express agent in charge was Mr. C. H. Murray, whose brave conduct so impressed the robber-gang that they thought a fellow with such grit and pluck was worthy to be spared. And it is to be hoped that his courage will not be altogether overlooked by the company he serves.

The conductor of the train, William Westfall, who fell a victim in the fray; shot dead without time for a dying word, his blood and brains scattered all along the smoking car and on the platform in front, was an old and widely respected conductor on the line. An opinion is somewhat current, that one of the motives of the onslaught, if not the chief motive, was vengeance on Westfall. It is reported that Westfall was a conductor on the Hannibal & St. Joe line some years ago, when the James brothers attacked and robbed a train, and that, when the Pinkerton agents went in vain pursuit of the thieves, Westfall was conductor of the train and acted in the capacity of guide to the Pinkerton clan. Some years ago a half brother of the James brothers was killed in a melee and a bombshell was thrown into the house of Mrs. Samuels, the mother of these men. It is believed that Westfall was concerned in both these acts of rough retribution, and that therefore, the James brothers cherished towards him the bitterest spirit of revenge. And as the old crusader had wrought upon his shield—"I bide my time;" so these border scoundrels waited for a convenient season for their revenge. However this may be, and whatever their motive was, the gang did their work most effectively.

The train left Kansas City on time on the memorable Friday night, and all went well till it reached Cameron, at which spot a number of the notorious gang boarded the train. At the next station east, Winston, the remaining members of the robber brood entered the train. It was now dark, and the train had not gone far out of Winston when the muderous work began. The bell connecting with the engine was pulled, presumably by some affrighted passenger; the fireman guessing something was wrong, said to the engineer, "give her hell."

The engineer suddenly turning round became aware of two masked men with drawn revolvers, seeming as though they were rising right off the coals glaring like fiends, one of whom said, in hoarse, commanding tones, "go on, you — — —," and he instantly pulled the throttle clean out of the valve, put out the light, and escaped almost miraculously through a rain of pistol shots. He and the fireman hung on to the cowcatcher for awhile and then escaped to the woods. Meantime a dreadful work was going on in the cars. William Westfall, the conductor, was collecting tickets, when a masked man, —undoubtedly the leader of the gang, Frank James —dressed in a linen duster and wearing a straw hat, followed by two others, came into the car, muttering something to the effect of, "You are my prisoner, you are the man I want," without time for a moment's reply, the quick, sharp crack of the revolver was heard and the conductor was shot. Westfall reeled against the seat and attempted to go out of the rear door of the car. But all in vain. Shot followed shot, and where the bullets struck, blood oozed forth from the crimson fountains. Westfall fell dead without a word, on the platform, and as the train was now slackening its pace his lifeless body rolled to the ground. Poor McMillan, a stone mason, in the employ of the company, coming to the door of the smoking car, was shot instantly dead by one of the stray shots. A scene of indescribable tumult followed. The masked robbers went through the cars firing their revolvers through the roof and threatening, with instant death any who should dare to stir. The panic of suspense was awful. Big stout men crawled to the floor and tried to get under the seats. Others tried to hide in the Pullman car, where one devout old lady was heard amid all the tumult praying aloud, that the good Lord would turn the hearts of these wicked men, and spare the lives of the passengers.

For the most part the women were much more courageous than the men. The latter hiding their valuables in all conceivable places; utilizing the water-cooler, the spittoons and their boots as secret hiding places for jewelry, watches and pocket-books. While others held up their valuables as a sacrifice to appease the avarice of these miserable ghouls. One poor wretch scared well-nigh to death, notwithstanding he was armed, pulled out his revolver and laying it on the window sill, saying: "Here, anybody can have this, I don't want it." One passenger in the Pullman car took the precaution to hide all his money in one of the pillows, which, perhaps, was the safest and wisest place under the circumstances. The prevailing idea was that the robbers were going through the train to plunder and murder every passenger if need be. But this was not their purpose. To keep the passengers terror-stricken for a little time was all they wanted of them. But the real work of the robbers was going on in the baggage car, where the valuables of the express company are always kept.

The night was very warm—it was mid-July—the baggage van was in charge of messenger C. H. Murray, and baggage-man Stampes; and they had the door of the car partly open for the sake of ventilation. When the train so suddenly stopped Stampes was going to the door to see what was the matter, but he was suddenly grabbed by the legs by one of four masked men who said in a savage tone of voice :

“Come out, you —— of a ——, come out!”

With this Stampes was dragged to the ground and told that if he moved an inch or spoke a word, he would be shot instantly dead.

Holding Stampes thus in guard the robbers next sought for Murray, the expressman in charge. He had for a moment hidden behind some trunks. They rushed for the door, but he had managed to slam it to and bar it. Then they began firing at the door. Twelve bullets were subsequently found in the door. One went through the door and grazed Murray's shoulder. Enraged at this delay they by the means of an ax burst open the door, yelling: “Where is that —— —— —— ——?”

At this Murray rose from among the trunks, and said:

“Here I am, what do you want?”

He was grabbed, whirled round two or three times, then struck with the butt end of a pistol and the key of the safe was of course demanded without a moment's delay.

Murray says that during their search of the safe, one of the robbers held two pistols within an inch of his nose and his right temple and never for one moment took his awful eye off him.

The leader of the gang then pulled out a sack and put all the money he could find into it, asking the guarded Murray how much money there was. Murray said he didn't know.

"Then you ought to know," said the leader. "What the devil do you do here in charge, without knowing? Come, now, be quick! I want all you have, every cent! And if you give me any more trouble, I'll kill you, by God!"

Murray said, "You've got everything but those silver bricks."

"Oh, d—n your silver bricks," was the rejoinder. "You might as well give up. We have killed your conductor and engineer, and we are going to kill you, so get down on your knees. There are twelve men in this gang, and we've got full possession of the train.

But Murray had no more to give them, and so having soundly abused him and struck him again with the revolver, they left the cars.

It was no part of their purpose to rob the passengers. They were not of the wealthy sort, and beside the time wasted in going through a whole train, except under very special circumstances largely enhances the danger. So having secured all the safe contained, they escaped to the woods where they left their horses.

They only secured $2,000 by this raid, and that divided among seven would not be a large fortune for each.

CHAPTER XLI.

FURTHER PARTICULARS OF THE LAST RAILWAY ROBBERY.

TESTIMONY OF EYE WITNESSES—WERE FRANK AND JESSE JAMES AT THE HEAD?—OPINIONS OF SHERIFF CROSBY AND BILLY PINKERTON—MR. HANKEL OF CHICAGO AND MAJOR SCOTT ANTHONY OF DENVER INTERVIEWED.

The first tidings of the robbery led to the impression that of course the James boys were in this last outrage. The whole affair bore their private trademark. But further evidence leaves no other conclusion possible, or at least reasonable.

Marcus A. Lowe, attorney of the railroad and Sheriff Brown Crosby of Daviess County declare unhesitatingly that they have every sound reason for giving the following as the list of the robbers:

Jesse and Frank James, Pope Wells, Jim Cummings, Parmer, a brother-in-law of the James boys, Miller, a brother of L. Miller, who was killed in Minnesota, and a young Samuels, a step-brother of the James brothers.

On the evening of the 16th July, forty-eight hours after the robbery the following letter was found on Dog Creek bridge, but a short distance from the spot where the robbers left the train and took to their horses.

KANSAS CITY, July 12, 1881.—CHARLEY: I got your letter to-day, and was glad to hear you had got everything ready in the time for the 15th. We will be on hand at the time. Bill will be with me. We will be on the train. Don't fear. We will be in the smoker at Winston. Have the horses and boys in good fix for the feast. We will make this joust on the night of the 16th inst. All is right here. Frank will meet us at Cameron. Look sharp and be well fixed. Have the horses well gaunted. We may have some riding to do sometime. Don't get excited, but keep cool till the right time. Willco (evidently meant for Wilcott) will be on the engine. I think it best to send this to Kidder. Yours till and through death. ALECK.

Mr. William Pinkerton of the great Chicago Detective Department says:—

“The work was undoubtedly done by Jesse and Frank James, who are the only survivors of the famous James and Younger gang, the remainder being dead or in the Penitentiary. Jesse James lives in Clay County, Missouri, and he can gather a party to rob a train in Clay County in about two days' time. He has a thorough knowledge of the country, and if need be will be secreted by the citizens for months so as to avoid arrest.

The voluminous testimony of those who were on board the Rock Island train that July night make it possible to give a more detailed and accurate account of this robbery than of any of the previous raids. The testimony of two of these eye witnesses will suffice.

Mr. Frederick Henkel of Chicago most obligingly gave his experience in answer to our questions, to the following effect:—

“I think that it was about twenty minutes past 9 o'clock. I had just had my supper, and was enjoying a cigar in the smoking-car. I think that the station is Princeton, Mo., where we had our supper, somewhere between Cameron and Winston station. About the time we arrived there we noticed a crowd of rather hard-looking characters about the station. They were together in groups of twos and threes. When we were through supper they yelled ‘All aboard.’ The first we knew the train was flying along at a rapid rate, and a man, very large, thick, heavy set, with a black beard, short but thick, came in, followed by a couple of others. He was dressed, as far as I could notice, in a linen coat and a straw hat, and the other parts of his clothing I don't recollect. The trio came in by way of the front platform of the smoking-car, and one of them, the man with the black beard, had a revolver cocked, in his hand. He muttered something and commenced to fire at the conductor. He ran out, and the others crowded up to him.”

“Which way did the conductor run?”

“He ran towards the rear platform out of the door, where I heard more shooting. We all ran back to the sleeping-cars where we belonged and threw ourselves on the floor. I only saw the gang at the station while they were in knots, and I should suppose that there were at least a dozen of them. I should think that there were four of them who came into the smoking-car. After the trouble was over we found the conductor's lantern and his brains on the rear platform."

"Was the train stopped?"

"No, we were on a stop when the bandits got on. The robbers held possession of the train. Three of the gang jumped on the engine, and with cocked revolvers compelled the engineer and fireman to submit. They couldn't do anything else. They were armed, but they couldn't get a chance to use them. In the excitement they crept away from their captors and put out the headlight. They also put the air-brakes on so that the speed was slackened. At Winston, to which they ran the train, one of the brakemen jumped off and telegraphed the death of the conductor and the stone mason, McMillan. The jig was up then, and the robbers ran away

"As soon as the train was in possession of the robbers, the passengers jumped down on the floor. Some of them hid under the seats. You see, it was unhealthy to be upon your feet at that time. It rained lead, and lead diet is unhealthy. There were six ladies in the sleeper, and as soon as they heard the shooting they just dropped on the floor like the other passengers. They were frightened, but they showed as much grit as the men. We couldn't show much, for not one of us had a revolver. John Mc-Millan was killed with the conductor. I think that the thieves recognized them and they were put out of the way on that account.

"I think that the express messenger, C. H. Murray, deserves a deal of credit for his pluck. The robbers shouted to him to open the door of his car, but he persistently refused. They fired thirteen shots at him, but none of them took effect. When they did break in they found him hidden between the coal-box and a sample trunk. They struck him twice over the head with a revolver, but said that they would not kill him because of his grit. The robbers only got $900 in money and a $1,000 bond. There was a large amount of bullion in the safe, but it was too heavy for the robbers to carry away. The passengers all endeavored to hide away their watches and money. One of them, a Chicago drummer, put his valuables in the water-cooler. I wrapped mine in a pocket-handkerchief, lifted the cover of a spittoon, laid it in, and put the lid on again. But the passengers were not molested. We found five bullets in the smoker and thirteen in the baggage-car."

"I boarded the train at Atchison. When we stopped at Cameron, Mo. (a point eleven miles southwest of Winston), where we had supper, two men got on and took seats in the sleeping-car, and soon engaged in an altercation with the conductor on the subject of fare. About eleven miles this side of Cameron (Winston), several more passengers got in, and the conductor made the remark that he was afraid there was going to be trouble. There was something in the manner of the man who made a fuss about the fare, he said, which made him think that mischief was brewing. We had not gone three-quarters of a mile after we left this stoppage-place when the trouble began. Some one stepped up from the platform in front of the smoking-car and laid his hand on Conductor Westfall's shoulder, as he was standing in the front part of the car, and said to him, 'You are my prisoner.' The conductor dodged down and ran further into the car. At this time there were already three armed men in the car, and when the one who had spoken to the conductor followed him in there were four. As he did so this one fired at the conductor twice, the first time with the revolver which he held in his right hand. The ball struck the right sleeve of the conductor's coat, tearing it from a little above the wrist to past the elbow, where it entered the arm. The man fired the other revolver, and the conductor turned to leave the car, and when he reached the platform some one else must have shot him in the back, inflicting a wound from which he died in about twenty minutes. About the time this happened the fireman, seeing that something was wrong, said to the engineer, 'give her hell,' a laconic way of telling him to get up all the speed he could. The engineer started to do so, but at the same moment three men arose from among the coals in the tender and began firing.

The did not hit either the engineer or the fireman with their bullets, but one of them struck the fireman on the side of the head with a large chunk of coal. They then left the engine-cab and climbed around and took seats on the cow-catcher, while the three robbers to whom had been intrusted the job of capturing the engine took possession of it. But as they did this the gang who had the securing of the express-car on their hands attacked it. They obtained admission and threatened to kill the messenger—Charley Murray, a slight and lightly built man, weighing perhaps 120 pounds—if he did not give up his keys. He did as they requested and they opened the safe, which was found to contain $900 in money, a $1,000 bond, and a quantity of silver bullion. They were intensely chagrined when they found that the safe contained so little, and asked: ‘Where is the rest of your money, G—d d—n you?’ Murray announced that that was all he had under his charge. They insisted that he must produce more, to which Murray answered, ‘You can’t draw blood from a turnip.’

“The leader of the seven men engaged in the express safe robbery said savagely, ‘Well, d—n you, I’ll draw blood from you then,’ at the same time striking him a blow on the head with his revolver, which laid Murray out senseless.

“I have no doubt,” Major Anthony added, “that the gang fully intended to go through the whole train. The first man who entered the smoking-car and who fired the first shots at the conductor, cried out 'hands up' as he advanced. The others seemed taken aback at the large number of people they found in the car, and looked from one to another and hesitated. The one who had entered the car looked around him after he had shot a couple of times, and seemed to be surprised that he was alone, and then backed out of the car, waving his revolver as he did so to keep the passengers from rising upon him."

"The passengers were considerably scared, were they not?"

"Yes. I've been in one or two tight places before, and did not feel particularly scared. I was in the sleeper, and I called out for every man in the car to get his weapon and prepare to do his duty. Not a soul, however, had one on the car. Then began the fun. It was amusing to see the fellows going down for their watches, and money, and other valuables, and hunting for places to hide them in. One man, who seemed in an agony of despair, called out, 'They can have all the money I own,' at the same time diving under a seat. All sorts of places were utilized as hiding-places for money, etc. Men pulled off their boots and shoved their wads or watches into them. Spittoons were utilized for the same purpose. I popped my money into the pillow—a pretty safe place, I think. The men on the car were terribly frightened—much more so than the women. The idea prevailed that the robbers were shooting through the windows at the passengers, and as many as could find snug refuge under a seat stowed themselves there, and remained there until long after the firing was over. On the other hand, not a woman seemed to be a particle excited. It was wonderful how coolly they took it. They now and then asked for an explanation of what was going on, and for pretty definite information as to when the affair was likely to end; but when, naturally enough, they found their curiosity could not be satisfied, they remained calmly in their seats and awaited future developments.

“There was one great danger which we escaped, as it were, by a miracle. When the car stopped, it did so not 200 yards in front of a high trestle. When the robbers had command of the locomotive they urged the train along at a tremendous rate of speed. Had this speed been kept up while the train was running along the trestle, it would, so railroad men tell me, have jumped the track to a dead certainty, and have become a total wreck, with a great destruction of life. The brakeman, Cole, however, by his opportune opening of the air-brake, slacked the train up and averted the calamity.

A great deal has been said concerning this last outrage. The public journals have made a special point of writing in an amusing vein of the timidity of the passengers, who could be so completely overawed by seven men!

Courage in an editorial sanctum is one thing, and courage in the front of a loaded Smith & Wesson's revolver is another. It needs no stretch of imagination to understand that a railway train thus suddenly boarded by men who have the reputation of being "the very deadeſt of dead ſhots," is not the likeliſt place for coolneſs and preſence of mind. And even the boldeſt editor

"That's crówing,
Like a cockrill three months old,
If he ſaw young Jeſſe's piſtol, Would'ſt be ſo blaſted bold!"

Of courſe there has been the offering of a large reward, and the uſual diligent ſearch. But not a dollar has been returned, nor a robber arreſted.

Daring and defiant, theſe men are ſtill more than a match for the detective ſagacity. They are ſtill the untamed and perhaps, ſo far as the leaders are concerned, the untamable Bandits of the Border.

CHAPTER XLII.

ANOTHER DARING ROBBERY.

GLENDALE ONCE MORE!—THE CHICAGO AND ALTON TRAIN RAIDED—THE HEROIC CONDUCT OF CONDUCTOR HAZELBAKER—THE AFFRIGHTED PASSENGERS—THE TESTIMONY OF EYE WITNESSES—“DRINK TO JESSE JAMES!”—WHO WERE THE ROBBERS?

The robbery recorded in the last chapter had scarcely ceased to be the topic of current conversation, before there swept along the telegraph wires the story of another raid. On a pleasant Autumn evening twelve masked men boarded a train not far from Glendale, and in an incredibly short space of time robbed the express-van, and then every passenger on board; having done which they decamped as mysteriously and as silently as they came.

The ill-fated train left Chicago on Tuesday morning, September the 6th, 1881, in charge of Conductor Hazelbaker. The passenger cars were well filled, and the Pullman had rather more than its usual load of ladies and gentlemen. All went well till about 9 o'clock on the following evening. It will be readily understood that on entering the region that had been so famous for these daring raids the conversation would be like enough to turn on these robbers of the road. But no fear or timidity was at all manifest. It was a lovely night. The September moon was shining full and fair, and a company of young Englishmen who were on a tour of pleasure, standing on the back platform of the Pullman car, beguiled the weary journey by singing one of those pleasant ditties that reminded them of the land they had left in the far away east. There were four of them, and they sang in exquisite taste—

“Come out, 'tis now September,
The hunter's moon's begun,
And through the wheat and stubble
Is heard the distant gun.
The leaves are paling yellow.
And trembling into red,
And the free and happy barley
Is hanging down its head.”

It was now 9 o'clock, the train was sweeping along in the region of Glendale—where the famous robbery of 1879 took place, when Jesse James led the robber band—the ladies in the Pullman car were about to retire for the night, when suddenly the train was brought to a stand still in a deep cut, where the Missouri Pacific crosses the track of the Chicago & Alton line, about three miles east of Independence. The train was immediately boarded by twelve men all masked. Boarded! It might rather be said that they dashed on like a pack of wild tigers, yelling and cursing, as though they had just been let loose from Pandemonium. The engineer, L. Foote, whose story is by all odds the most intelligible account of the whole affair, and whose testimony will be found in detail further on—was ordered on pain of death to step down from his engine. He, in company with John Steading, his fireman, obeyed. At the point of a well-loaded revolver, Foote was made to take a coal pick from his engine and break down the door of the express-car. Fox, the express messenger, scenting danger the moment the train stopped, had hidden himself in the weeds near the line, but was induced to re-appear on hearing the vagabonds swear with awful oaths that if the express messenger did not turn up they would shoot Foote and Steading as dead as rats! The engineer and fireman were covered by four loaded revolvers, while others of the gang were going through the express-van; and because they thought Fox a little dilatory in his movements, they belabored his head with the butt end of a pistol. The leader wore a white cloth over his face, with holes in it. He swore a great deal. And the whole gang seemed to be annoyed that there was only some $25,000 to be secured. This, of course, was poured into a sack after the invariable custom, and most securely guarded. The engineer and fireman were held as prisoners till the work was done.

Meantime others of the raiders had entered the train, and swearing and swaggering and firing off their revolvers, declared: "We are coming in and going through you all, so d—n you be quick and hold up your hands!”

Hazelbaker, the Conductor and Burton the brakeman divined from the moment the train began to slack that there was mischief and they went through the cars warning the passengers and begging them as they valued their lives to keep quiet. Having done this, these two brave men did a deed that for true daring and bravery, deserves not only to be chronicled here, but to be remembered gratefully by every passenger on that ill-fated train, to say nothing of the company they so faithfully served. The freight-train was following fast and Hazelbaker and Burton both knew that if the train was not flagged the chances were that the passenger train would be wrecked with an awful loss of life.

So through a drizzling rain of shot and at the imminent peril of their lives, these brave men went and flagged the fast following freight train.

But Hazelbaker tells the story best himself. In response to one or two questions he replies:—

“When I reached the sleeper I told Burton, my brakeman, to flag the train following. I knew there was a freight right after me, and would wreck my train, and I knew that that train must be stopped. Burton said he did not like to go, but the brave fellow went just the same. We dropped off together, and they began to fire at us. Shots whistled all around us. I think there were probably twenty shots fired at us altogether. We finally succeeded in flagging the freight-train just in time, and I went back, and, climbing aboard the sleeper, took a back seat and waited quietly to be robbed."

Hazelbaker further says that the gang swore a great deal and seemed to centre all their wrath on him. Threatening his life if he continued to run on that line. The leader who said he was Jesse James put a pistol under the nose of the conductor and said:

"D—n you smell of that, that's the pistol I shot Westfall with at Winston!"

The robbers were greatly incensed because the Governor of Missouri had offered a reward for their capture. And one of the masked men threatened with many an oath:

"Now listen you ——, the next reward that's offered we'll burn your d—d train and don't you forget it! We will cut the Pullman loose and save it, because Pullman is white; and never offered a reward, but we will make a bonfire of your train as sure as you live."

In answer to further questions Hazelbaker said:—

"From their talk it appeared that the robbery was a piece of dare-deviltry in revenge for the Winston reward being offered. They constantly shoved pistols under my nose, and reminded me of Westfall's fate. After they left we pulled out, and as quick as we could."

"How many were there?"

"There were six in the sleeper and four or five outside."

"Did they expose themselves?"

“Not at all! I could see their forms, but absolutely nothing of their features. The leader, supposed to be Jesse James, had on a white muslin cloth with holes cut in it around his head, as if he had made a mask of a handkerchief. The others wore masks of dirty cloth or calico. They were all slender men except the leader, who was a tall, well-built man.”

“Could you identify any of them?”

“No, and there lies the trouble.”

“How much money do you suppose they got?”

“I could not tell. They took from each passenger between $1 and $300, and maybe got a couple of thousand. I don't know how much was in the express car.”

It is believed that the robbers secured from the express van some $2,500, and from the passengers in money about $4,000, and in jewelry, in gold watches and diamond ear-rings and broaches and the like, they secured what would aggregate a sum not far short of $12,000 to $15,000.

The conductor managed to hide most of his money and jewelry successfully, but poor Fox was not as fortunate. In describing his experience after the gang had ransacked the safe he says:—

“When they had robbed the safe of everything. I ran back into the smoking-car and hid most of my money. The robbers came in and ordered me, with an oath, to lie down. I did so, and they shoved a gun up to my head and told me to fork over. I said my money was under the cushion. They told me to get it, and I got it in a hurry, you bet. It was somewhere in the neighborhood of fifteen dollars.”

For the most part the passengers yielded to the demands of the robbers without a word of remonstrance. One lady in the sleeper fainted under the influence of terror, and one of the gang threw a glass full of water in her face and told her she had nothing to be afraid of, all she had to do was to “fork out!”

The work accomplished, the robbers departed as speedily and as strangely as they came. No narrative of this robbery would be complete that did not incorporate the testimony of engineer Foote. His testimony is therefore inserted at this point. When asked to tell the story of that eventful night he proceeded as follows:—

“Between three and four miles east of Independence is a deep cut, over which the Missouri Pacific track crosses the Chicago & Alton, and it was just before entering the deepest part of this cut that I saw a pile of stones, probably five feet high, on the top of which was a stick, to which was attached a red rag, and behind the whole stood the leader of the robbers. Of course I stopped. I was then approached by four of the gang, besides the leader, who said, ‘Step down off that engine, and do as I tell you, or I will kill you.’ He then told me to get the coal pick, which I did, after some parleying, but as a revolver was pointed at my head I could not refuse to obey.

“They then marched myself and John Steading, the fireman, to the express car, and ordered me to break the door down, which I did. Messenger Fox had hidden in the weeds by the roadside, but they swore they would kill me if he didn't come out, and so I called for him and he entered the car with two of the robbers, who forced him to open the safe and pour its contents into a sack."

"They were disappointed at not getting more booty, and knocked Fox down twice with the butt end of a navy revolver, cutting his head in a fearful manner. They then marched us to the coaches, where they kept us covered with revolvers while they robbed the passengers. After the last car was gone through they marched us back to the engine, when the leader said: 'Now, get back there. We will remove the stones. You have been a bully boy, and here is a little present for you,' and he handed me two silver dollars. I told them I would remove the obstructions, and the entire gang skipped over the embankment, and were out of sight in a twinkling."

"In going through the passengers, each one was made to hold up his hands, and what was taken from them was put into a two-bushel sack, which was nearly full of watches, money, and other valuables. They didn't take anything from me."

"The train was stopped only a car-length off. When I came back one of the robbers said: 'Have you lost anything?' I answered: 'Fifty cents.' He gave me $1.50 for interest. Then I heard one of the robbers say to the engineer: 'Choppy Foote, you're too good a man to keep up this business; here's $2 to buy a drink in the morning, and drink it for Jesse James. I warn you you'll be killed if you don't leave this road. We are going to tear up and burst the Alton and Rock Island roads, for they have been offering rewards for us. We've no grudge against the Pullmans, and will switch off their cars and burn all the rest. I am the man who killed Westlake at Winston. He was too smart and drew a revolver.'"

The question arises, "who were these robbers?" The leader whoever he was assumed to be Jesse James. Some imagined that if he had been Jesse in reality he would never have given his name. But have we not seen over and over again in these pages how Jesse and Frank were capable of the strangest as well as the most daring courses. They would join a posse in search of themselves with the utmost glee. The general opinion is that the gang was headed by Jesse James, and if "Choppy Foote" did drink to Jesse James the next day with the $2 provided by the very considerate robbers for that laudable purpose, maybe he did not drink to the wrong man.

It has been affirmed by a gentleman of repute that Jesse was seen not far from Kearney three days before the robbery. Mrs. Samuels, the mother of the boys, being interviewed answered with a wicked, satirical leer:

"How could Jesse be there? Don't you know that George Shepherd killed him? How could a dead boy rob a train? I'm surprised at you!"

The Missourians rose in anger at this last outrage

A posse of 200 men started in pursuit, and they have not utterly failed. Nine out of twelve of the robbers are supposed to have been captured, and are now behind the prison bars. Matt Chapman, the first of the gang arrested, is said to have given the whole crowd away.

On the other hand an ex-official, who evidently knows more than he cares to tell, avers that these arrests will all end in a screaming farce, and that the old birds are snug enough in their hidden nests enjoying the spoils of their latest fray.

Marshal Murphy and Whig Keshlead have done most of the arresting, and it is said that they came within an ace of capturing Ed. Miller, a brother of Clell Miller, who was shot in the Northfield raid. If Ed. Miller is indeed caught it will look as if the pursuers are on the right track. Chapman, Andy Ryan and Fisk are caught. Chapman was caught in a billiard saloon. When Ed. Miller and Little Dick are caught then will be a good time to go in search of Jesse James.

CHAPTER LXIII.

A SUDDEN TURN OF FORTUNE'S WHEEL.

LIGHT ON THE BLUE CUT ROBBERY—THE WHOLE GANG
GIVEN AWAY BY A CONFEDERATE—JOHN LAND'S
CONFESSION — GOVERNOR CRITTENDEN RE-SOLVED TO RID MISSOURI OF THE BAN-DITS — SECRECY AND SILENCE.

The pitcher goes often to the fountain, but it is broken at last. The longest lane comes to an abrupt and unexpected turning. The wild career of the James Brothers has gone on unchecked so long, that there is no wonder that many regarded them as invincible if not invulnerable. They seemed to bear a charmed life. And though they were scarred and wounded, and bullet-laden, they lived on defiantly as if they dared fate to the uttermost. But fortune is a fickle jade. She turns her mystic wheel with a capricious hand. She smiles to-day with little cause for smiling and the next day frowns without any cause at all. The fabled Nemesis waits long and patiently by the wayside, but at last vengeance wakes, and doom comes swift as lightning and awful as death.

Jesse James had had his day, and an awful day it had been. Born in 1845, we find him in 1862 an enthusiastic follower of Quantrell's black flag that carried danger and death in every breath of its sombre folds. For twenty years Jesse, the Ishmael of Missouri, had had his hand against every man, and every man's hand against him. How many awful murders were on his head it would be difficult to tell, probably the murderer did not know himself. His sun was destined to set suddenly not in peace and calm, but in tragedy and blood.

In September, 1881, occurred the daring robbery of the Chicago & Alton train, recorded in our last chapter. The question as to Jesse James's share in that terrible raid was for a long time an open question. The leader of that daring onslaught assumed to be Jesse James. It was said that if Jesse had really been there, he would never have given himself away in such a rash and heedless manner. And yet, these pages reveal that there was hardly any limit to the daring of these outlawed brothers. And not a few suggested that this very method was hit upon in order to bluff off any too minute and careful enquiries. It is now clear beyond all question, that Jesse was the leader of the Blue Cut raid. The country was scoured for miles around after that eventful September night, and the vigilant search made by over two hundred men resulted in the capture of nine out of twelve of the gang. The old adage about "honor amongst thieves" must henceforth be taken with a grain of salt. The idle boast that there is a very sacred code of honor amongst thieves, and gamblers, and blacklegs, to which they always yield a very loyal allegiance is played out. These gallant braves, who are so heroic with loaded revolvers in the presence of unarmed, defenceless men and women, only need to be handcuffed and put behind the bars, and they will then squeal for all they are worth. Their robber's code of honor goes for nothing, when their precious necks are in danger. They swallow all their oaths and pledges sworn in blood, and become wonderfully enamored of the great principle that "preservation is the first great law of nature." All this is most natural; and no other course can be reasonably expected. But all this talk of "honor among thieves" and "dying game," is so much nonsense and buncombe.

On the 27th of March, 1882, John Bugler, one of the Cracker's Neck citizens involved in the Blue Cut robbery, was arraigned at Independence, Mo. Bugler's case was called, but it had transpired that John Land, who was also under indictment, had made a full confession, and had given the entire gang away. It had been suspected for some time that Land had squealed, but his secret was well kept. His testimony was most minute and explicit. He said that at least ten days before the robbery he had been interviewed by Creed Chapman and John Bugler, who told him that Jesse James and Jim Cummins had put up a job to rob the Chicago & Alton Express train at Blue Cut, and they invited him to take a part. He claims that he refused for some time to have anything whatever to do with the robbery. But at last, when he came into personal contact with Jesse James, he was so charmed by that leader's persuasive arguments, or so afraid of him, that he resolved to throw in his lot with the adventurous band. He says that Jesse James averred that he had come into possession of news, on which he could rely, that on the night of the 7th of September the Kansas City Banks would receive large sums of money by the Chicago & St. Louis Express, and therefore that train was selected.

On the evening of the robbery the party, consisting of, Jesse James, Dick Little, and the old gang, John Bugler, Creed Chapman, John Mott, and Henry Bugler, who met in a wild spot near Glendale station, and perfected the plans for stopping the train. John Mott was at that time agent at Glendale station, and he furnished a lantern and red flag to signal the train. Land took the lantern and stopped the train, and while Jesse James and Dick Little robbed the express car, the others of the party robbed the passengers. A mistake was made in regard to the shipment of money, as $600 was all that the express safe yielded. The amount taken from the passengers, however, aggregated something over $15,000. As soon as the robbery was committed the gang repaired to an old house in Cracker Neck forest, and there made a partial division of the money, but pursuit being organized so soon after, Jesse James took possession of all the money and valuables and with the members of his gang fled to Clay county, advising the Cracker Neck boys to go about their business and assist the officers in the search, promising to make an equal division of the money and at some convenient time return and pay each party his respective share. This part of the programme was, however, never carried out, and none of the natives ever received any dividend. Land, Bugler, and Chapman were arrested three days after the robbery, and have been in jail ever since.

The universal abomination of these cruel and lawless raids was manifest in the way in which the whole neighborhood set to work to hunt the robbers.

But secretly and unknown Governor Crittenden was working to bring the whole band within the reach of the law. From that fatal night in July, 1881, when John Westfall was killed on the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific train, near the old battle ground of Glendale, the Governor was resolved to leave no stone unturned to put an end to these wild raids. Missouri had grown heartily sick of its unenviable fame. The public journals of other States were casting serious reflections on the Missourians, as though forsooth they were almost conniving at these robberies. The public journals are sometimes "a little too previous." It is so easy for everybody to manage the devil but those who are possessed of him. And the capture of Jesse or Frank, or any of their compeers, was scarcely a holiday amusement. The reputation of Jesse as a "dead shot" was such that most men would have preferred going round a block rather than meet him in an angry mood. The very sight of him struck terror into men and women who were by no means cowards. Jesse said himself, on one occasion, to a bosom friend, that he could stop a coach as easily with a corn-cob as with a revolver. And no doubt he was speaking the truth.

Governor Crittenden was resolved to rid Missouri of Jesse if it was possible, so all through the summer time he was quietly and secretly working. He felt that it was an outrage to think that a whole State, with all the force of law at its back, should be baffled and defied by a handful of lawless men. The one difficulty was a very practical one. There had never been offered a reward large enough. It was necessary that $50,000, at least, should be awarded. Governor Crittenden made an appeal to those Railway and Express Companies so deeply interested on financial grounds.

The appeal was very heartily and very promptly responded to. The money was quickly subscribed. The amount pledged was $50,000. The Chicago & Rock Island, Chicago & Alton, Burlington, Wabash & Missouri Pacific each pledged $5,000. The express companies also made liberal donations. These companies had all suffered by the depredations of the Missouri banditti. It was conditioned that

$10,000 should be offered for each of the James boys and $5000 for each of the other designated outlaws, the Governor being authorized to draw on the railroad companies for specified installments as fast as needed. Two installments have already been drawn and disbursed. The railroad officials say that the installment covering the case of Jesse James will be paid with "promptness and dispatch."

All the while silence was kept. The operations for the capture of Jesse James were carried on in secret, and the secret was well kept. The net was gradually gathering round Jesse James. His days were numbered. His head, throbbing with new plots of robbery and murder, or silent and motionless in death was now worth $50,000 to whomsoever led the hardihood and daring to secure it.

CHAPTER LXIV.

WOMAN — DICK LITTLE SURRENDERS — HIS CONFESSION — JESSE'S QUIET LIFE AT ST. JOSEPH—LAST VISIT HOME
—BOB FORD'S PLOT.

On Saturday morning, April 1st, 1882, Governor Crittenden was interviewed in respect to the James Gang.

“Do you think you are at last on the track of Jesse James and his Gang?” was the question proposed.

“I do,” replied the Governor, “and I will capture him — dead or alive. He may rest assured of that. He is an extraordinary man in his line, and would have made a valuable man to society had he chosen an honest life. He is a natural-born leader of men. In this instance he is like many bad men, but I think his career is about ended. His old friends are leaving him, as his association is dangerous to their liberties. The big reward I offered for Frank and Jesse has had a happy effect. The cupidity of man is only equaled by the force of the 'root of all evil' — money. Remember what I say, I will sooner or later capture these gentlemen of the pistol and the brush. They have about completed their bloody circle."

The Ford boys had been long and skillfully at work. As far back as November, 1881, they had been quietly gaining upon the confidence of the man whose life it was their business to watch, and take, rather than Jesse should escape.

But an event transpired on the 16th of February, 1882, that must be chronicled here. Governor Crittenden was in his office at the Capitol, in Jefferson City, in conversation with a friend. Their talk drifted from President Arthur and his Cabinet and the general affairs of the nation to more local topics, and very naturally, to the one question in which the Governor had grown most interested.

"Are you satisfied with your efforts in the direction of suppression?" asked the Governor's friend.

"Well, I have good reason to be, I think," responded the Governor. "I think the result shows good work. Two in the penitentiary for twenty-five years each, two in coffins, five in jail in Independence on their way to the penitentiary, two more under the control of the officers of the law, leaving only the old leaders, Frank and Jesse James, both of whom, I hope, will soon be beyond the limits of their own freedom."

Here the conversation ended, and soon the Governor was left alone to his official duties. But he was called again from his tasks and this time it was by a thickly veiled lady who had a number of strange questions to ask as to the conditions on which an outlaw might surrender himself to justice with some hope of safety. But the Governor shall tell the story in his own words:

“On the 16th of February, a mysterious woman appeared at my office and asked me upon what terms an outlaw could surrender. I said it was owing to the man. Frank nor Jesse James could surrender under no assurances of immunity from punishment. If any others of the gang came in with an honest intention of abandoning their nefarious life, and with a full determination to assist the law officers in capturing Jesse and Frank James, ready at all times to go in pursuit of them, and, if necessary, die in the effort to capture them, he could come in, and I would use my influence for his protection; but not until I was fully convinced of the sincerity and honesty of his intentions — no reservations in behalf of any old friend, sympathizer, or actor.”

But who was this mysterious woman? And for whom did she plead?

Rumor with tongue as inventive as it is busy, spread the report that this mysterious woman was none other than Mattie Collins, the alleged wife of Dick Little, the well-known accomplice of Jesse James. This, however, Governor Crittenden strongly denies. He says he never saw Mattie Collins in his life to know her, but the veiled lady he knew perfectly well, but refused to give her name, or any clue to her identity.

There is no difficulty, however, as to the outlaw for whom she was interesting herself, for in three days afterwards — February 19th, 1882,— Dick Little surrendered to John R. Timberlake, Sheriff of Clay County, and on the 22d of the same month he was taken to Jefferson City, and the testimony of the officials who had charge of him is that, so far as they could judge, Dick Little had acted in good faith, and that his surrender was a genuine surrender.

The character of Little's confession can only be surmised. Up to this date it has been kept a profound secret. It is said to be very voluminous, and as Dick Little was thoroughly acquainted with all the secrets of the Gang it is fair to presume that the confession will cover a very large area. Governor Crittenden has gone so far as to say that the confession will include in its comprehensiveness names of many who little dream of the talk of their old associate. When further questioned on the subject, the Governor said that all reports of Little's confession were spurious, and further added: "The confession is a voluminous one, and took two days and a half to write it down. It has been shown to nobody, and will be kept a secret until such time as I deem it advisable to give it out. It is entirely under my control. No one aside from myself and two or three others know a word of what it contains. Little is not accessible to reporters. He has been ordered not to talk to them. The reason for not making Little's confession public is that it implicates a great many people who are supposed to be in good standing in the community."

The report that Dick Little had revealed all he knew of his old comrades reached the ears of Jesse James, who with a face on fire with relentless hatred said he would give $1000 for Dick's scalp, and swore he would have it sooner or later.

The destiny of Dick Little is not determined, on being asked if Dick had been pardoned, or assured of a pardon, the Governor replied:

"I have not pardoned Little. Such talk is all bosh. I pardon not before conviction. I hope he will be of much service to the state. Sometimes criminals turn State's evidence and do much good. I will always encourage the lesser criminal to convict the greater. That is not only a custom, but is the law, and is worthy of observance."

Jesse James went with his wife and his two children to reside at St. Joseph, Mo., in November last, under the assumed name of Mr. Thomas Howard. He seemed to be living in security; but he was shadowed daily, and little dreamed that an avenging foe was so near.

Two young men, assuming the name of Johnson, but whose real names are Robert and Charles Ford, the former 20 years of age, the latter 24, who hailed from Richmond, Ray County, Mo., and who are said to be cousins to Jesse James by marriage, were detailed by Governor Crittenden, H. H. Craig, Police Commissioner of Kansas City, and Sheriff Timberlake, of Clay County, to make sure of Jesse at all risks and hazards.

The Ford boys were no strangers to either Frank or Jesse. Their home in Richmond has often been the stopping place of the James Gang. If these boys had not been actual accomplices with Frank and Jesse in their lawless exploits, they had evinced so much sympathy with them, that there could be nothing remarkable in their assumed desire to join the band of robbers. No man is at all times wise, and the most cautious men are sometimes caught napping when their interests need them to be widest awake.

When Jesse, with his wife and "twa wee bairns" came to live in St. Joseph, they lived in the southeast part of the city, on the hill not far from Worth's Hotel. The winter months passed very quietly, and Jesse was but very seldom seen. He was in the habit of keeping close indoors during the day, and all the visits made to the city were paid after nightfall; and then the journey was short and the return home was speedy. The nightly errand was for his favorite journals, the Chicago Tribune, the Cincinnati Commercial and the Kansas City Times; in the perusal of which he spent most of his time. The neighbors took little interest in the new family. If they said anything at all, it was to the effect that the "Howard's" were a very quiet people.

Christmas passed pleasantly. Jesse had the reputation of being a very devoted father, and when he had no "professional business" on hand, he would spend most of his time in "cutting up with the young 'uns." Everything indicates that had Jesse chosen a quiet and honorable walk in life, he would have been a thoroughly domestic man.

All through the history of the James' Boys there has been a remarkable exhibition of filial affection. Frank and Jesse have never failed to show strong affection for their mother, while Mrs. Samuels, though stern and unbending in her nature, evinced boundless love for her sons, and was undoubtedly proud of their terrible exploits. She had been a faithful ally many and many a time. She had often obtained information of the greatest importance to them in their wild expeditions; and if half that is said of her is true, she was frequently consulted, and her counsel taken in the plots and schemes of the robber band.

About a fortnight before his death Jesse paid his last visit to his mother, at the Kearney homestead. The Spring was just making its appearance, and the old home of his childhood was donning its robe of vernal beauty. Little did Jesse think that before the bud changed to blossom he would lie sleeping under the grass with a bullet through his brain. His life had always been in danger. He had been in more "imminent perils" than Othello could recount. But this time did not seem specially perilous, except from hints that came of the thorough determination of Governor Crittenden to make a full end of bank robbing and train wrecking. The arrest of so many confederates had somewhat unnerved him. And Dick Little's surrender was ominous. But, like Hamlet in the play, he "defied augury." He had borne a charmed life so far, and he would not blench with fear till there was some real cause.

Of the details of that last visit into Clay County only little is known; but that little is of great import to this narrative. It was during this visit that Robert Ford made the final arrangements that ended so disastrously for Jesse. Nearly all Jesse's old comrades were in prison or dead. The James Gang was utterly broken up, and Jesse evidently had no intention of giving up his course of life. What he wanted was new and good material. And Robert Ford seemed to him the kind of stuff to make a bank robber out of. And probably Jesse was right in his estimate of his dear relative.

Another matter was pressing on Jesse's attention; funds were getting low. He had not more than some $600 or $700, and the failing coffers must be replenished. The enormous amounts of money obtained by this Gang is only a little more remarkable than the speed with which it disappeared. It is another illustration of the old adage, "easy come, easy go."

A reference to the earlier pages of this book will show that the James Brothers must have secured by their nefarious proceedings not less than $275,000; and yet, Jesse James had not a thousand dollars when he died.

At this last visit home, Jesse talked over a plot with Robert Ford for robbing another bank. But all unknown and unsuspected, he was himself the victim of a plot within a plot. Deep and subtle and far-seeing as he was “Beneath his depth,

A deeper depth
Lay threatening to devour.”

CHAPTER LXXV

TRAGIC END OF JESSE JAMES.

JESSE GROWS NERVOUS—PLOT TO ROB PLATTE CITY BANK—THE FATAL APRIL MORNING—JESSE JAMES SHOT DEAD!—DIES IN HIS WIFE'S ARMS—UNIVERSAL CONSTERNATION —ROBERT FORD'S STORY.

There is no disguising the fact that Jesse James returned from that last visit home in a restless mood. A long spell of inaction always made him nervous. He wanted to be at his old tasks. There seemed to be a perfect enchantment for him in the old perilous way of life. The more perilous the more he liked it.

He had resolved to make a raid on the Bank of Platte City. The Burgess murder trial was fixed for April the 4th. His plan was to examine the premises of the Bank on the night previously, and then, when the trial was in full swing, and the majority of the citizens would be absorbed in the trial, to make one of those bold dashes that had been so successful in former years. Robert Ford approved of the plan and suggested his brother Charles as a companion worthy of sharing the enterprise with them. Jesse had met the boy at the latter's house, near Richmond, three years ago, and consented to see him. It was finally agreed that Charles should join in the raid.

On Sunday, March the 26th, just eight days before the murder of Jesse, Robert and Charles Ford became inmates of the home of Jesse James. The house is a one-story cottage, painted white, with green shutters, and romantically situated on the brow of a lofty eminence, east of the city, commanding a fine view of the principal portion of the city, the river, and the railroad; and adapted as by nature for the perilous and desperate calling of Jesse. Just east of the house is a deep, gulch-like ravine, and beyond a broad expanse of open country, backed by a belt of timber. The house, except from the west side, can be seen for several miles. There is a large yard attached to the cottage, and a stable where Jesse had been keeping two horses, which were found after the terrible murder.

Ever since the boys had been with Jesse they had watched for an opportunity to shoot him, but he was always so heavily armed that it was impossible to draw a weapon without him seeing it. They declare they had no idea of taking him alive, considering the undertaking suicidal. The opportunity they had long wished for came on the morning of Monday, April 3d. Breakfast was over. Charles Ford and Jesse James had been in the stable currying their horses preparatory to their night ride. On returning to their room where Robert was, Jesse said: "It's an awfully hot day."

He pulled off his coat and vest, and tossed them on the bed. Then he said, "I guess I'll take off my pistols, for fear somebody will see them if I walk in the yard." He unbuckled the belt in which he carried two forty-five calibre revolvers, one a Smith & Wesson, and the other a Colt, and laid them on the bed with his coat and vest. He then picked up a dusting-brush, with the intention of dusting some pictures which hung on the wall. To do this he got on a chair. His back was turned to the Ford boys, but for a moment; but it was the fatal moment for Jesse. The lynx-eyed brothers seized the opportunity, and in a moment, a ball from a gun which Jesse had presented to Robert Ford, only a day or two before, as a token of regard, went crashing through Jesse's brain. He fell with a heavy thud to the ground, the blood oozed in a crimson stream from the gaping wound, and in less time than it takes to tell, Jesse James, the terror of Missouri lay dead.

This daring deed was the work of a moment. No sooner had Jesse mounted the chair than the two brothers stepped between Jesse and his revolvers and at a motion from Charlie, both drew their guns.

Robert was the quicker of the two. In one moment he had a long weapon level with his eye, with the muzzle no more than four feet from the back of the outlaw's head. Even in that moment, quick as thought, there was something that did not escape the acute ears of the hunted man. He made a motion as if to turn his head to ascertain the cause of that suspicious sound, but too late. A nervous pressure on the trigger, a quick flash, a sharp report, and all was over.

There was no outcry, just a swaying of the body, and it fell heavily back upon the carpet. The shot had been fatal, and all the bullets in the chamber of Charlie's revolver still directed at Jesse's head, could not more effectually have decided the fate of the greatest Bandit and Freebooter that ever figured in the pages of the country's history. The ball had entered the base of the skull and made its way out through the forehead over the left eye. It had been fired out of a Colt 45, of improved pattern, silver mounted and pearl handled.

Mrs. James was in the kitchen when the shooting was done, divided from the room in which the bloody tragedy occurred, by the dining-room. She heard the shot, and leaving her household duties, ran into the front room. She saw her husband lying on his back and his slayers each holding revolvers in hand, making for the fence in the rear of the house. Robert had reached the inclosure and was in the act of scaling it, when she stepped to the door and called to him, "Robert, you have done this! Oh! my God! my God!! What shall I do?" Then with a wild shriek, she cried, "Come back—come back!"

Turning back to the horrible scene, Mrs. James fell to her knees and took the head of her dying husband to her breast and sought to staunch the gushing wound, but her efforts were all in vain. Faster and faster the crimson tide flowed on; the face grew rigid, Jesse looked as if he would have said something if he could, but it was too late! One gasp for breath and all was over! Jesse died by the hand of a treacherous confederate, but he died in the arms of the wife he loved so well.

It was early on the bright spring morning that this fatal shot was fired. And Jesse was yet only in the prime of early manhood. He was but 37 years old! But what years they had been!

"Men live in deeds, not breaths,
In feelings, not in figures on a dial."

What deeds of violence had crowded into Jesse's brief life! There was blood enough on his hands to have darkened and stained the record of a century! The scene was sad enough, and yet it was not strange that a life that had luxuriated in deeds of violence should meet so violent an end!

Charles Ford tried to persuade Mrs. James that the pistol shot that made her a widow had been fired accidentally.

"Gone off by accident! No, I guess not!" and she darted a look at Charles Ford that was more expressive than any uttered language.

The cry of the little children was heartrending as they saw their dead father lying in a pool of blood, and saw their mother frantic with wild emotion.

“Poor papa!! Poor papa!!” they cried as they clung to their sad-hearted mother. For whatever the dead man had been to the world at large, he had been to them a true and loving father. And their little hearts were sore distressed. While this scene was going on in the now desolate home, Robert and Charles Ford made their way to the telegraph office, and sent messages to the Sheriff of Timberlake County, Governor Crittenden, and others, and then they surrendered themselves to Marshal Craig and a posse of officers.

When the Ford boys appeared at the police station they were told by an officer that Marshal Craig and a posse of officers had gone in the direction of the James residence, and they started after them and surrendered themselves. They accompanied the officers to the house and returned in the custody of the police to the Marshal's headquarters, where they were furnished with a dinner, and about 3 o'clock were removed to the old Circuit room, where the inquest was held in the presence of an immense crowd. Mrs. James also accompanied the officers to the City Hall, having previously left her two children, aged 7 and 3, a boy and a girl, at the house of Mrs. Lurnal, who had known the Jameses under the assumed name of Howard, ever since they had occupied the adjoining house.

Mrs. James was greatly affected by the tragedy, and heartrending moans and expressions of grief were sorrowful evidence of the love she bore the desperado.

The report of the killing of the notorious outlaw spread like wildfire through the city, and as usual, the reports assumed every variety of form and color. Very few accredited the news however, and simply laughed at the idea that Jesse James was really the dead man. Nevertheless, the excitement ran high, and one confirming report succeeded another.

Crowds of hundreds gathered in the streets, the Court House was crowded and every train brought in crowds of people attracted by the rumor of Jesse James's death.

Coroner Heddins was notified and Undertaker Sidenfader instructed to remove the body to his establishment. A large crowd accompanied the Coroner to the Morgue, but only a few, including reporters, were admitted. Nothing in the appearance of the remains indicated the desperate character of the man or the many bloody scenes of which he had been an actor. Only the lower part of the face, the square cheek bones, the stout, prominent chin, covered with a soft, sandy beard, and the thin, firmly closed lips, in a measure betrayed the determined will and iron courage of the dead man. A further inspection of the body revealed two large bullet holes on the right side of the breast, within three inches of the nipple, a bullet wound in the leg, and the absence of the middle finger of the left hand. After viewing the remains, the Coroner repaired to the court, whither soon after Mrs. James, in the custody of Marshal Craig, and the two Ford boys, both heavily armed, followed. They were kept in separate apartments until the jury announced themselves ready to hear testimony. A jury was impaneled as follows: W. H. Chouning, J. W. Moore, Warren Samuels, Thomas Morris, William Turner, William George. The witnesses examined were Mrs. James, the Ford boys, and Dick Little.

It was still hard to believe that Jesse was really dead. Hunted so long—hunted by thousands, could it be possible that he had been run to ground at last? The news if not too good, was yet too strange to be true. Robert Ford was interviewed and as his words are of considerable importance at this stage of our story, we give the narrative as it came from the lips of the murderer of Jesse James.

“So they say that the dead man isn't Jesse James, do they? Then they are mistaken. I first met Jesse James three years ago, and I have made no mistake. He used to come over to the house when I was on my oldest brother's farm. Last November he moved here to St. Joe and went under the name of Thomas Howard. He rented a house on the hill, back of the Worlds Hotel, a quiet part of the town and not thickly settled. My brother Charley and I had known nearly all of the gang, but had never worked with them otherwise.

I was in collusion with the detectives, and was one of the party that went to Kentucky and arrested Clarence Hite, last February. Hite got twenty-five years in the penitentiary. Jesse never suspected that we were false to him, and, as his gang was all broken up, he wanted new material and regarded us favorably. Two weeks ago he came to Clay county to see his mother, Mrs. Samuels, who lives forty miles east of Kansas City. Charley and I told him then we wanted to join him and be outlaws, and he said all right. Charley came here with him a week ago Sunday, and I followed last Sunday night. We both staid at his house, a one-story building with seven rooms.

Governor Crittenden had offered $10,000 reward for Jesse, dead or alive. We knew that the only way was to kill him. He was always cool and self-possessed, but always on the watch. During the day he would stay around the house, and in the evening he would go down town to the news depot and get the papers. He said there were men here who ought to know him, but they never did. He took the Chicago "Tribune," Cincinnati Commercial, and Kansas City Times regularly, and always knew what was going on all over the world. About a week ago he read a piece in one of the papers that Jesse James's career was over, and Charlie said he was awful mad about it. He said he would show them, before long, that Jesse James was not done yet.

He had not done any job since the "Blue-Cut" train-robbery, last September, and I don't believe he had over $700 or $800 in money. He was thinking of robbing some bank, near by, and then running in under close cover. It was for this he wanted our help. We knew we had to kill him, but there was no chance to get the drop on him until this morning.

His wife, and boy of 7, and girl of 3, were in the kitchen. Jesse was in the front sitting-room, where he slept. Never knew him to be so careless. He commenced brushing the dust off some picture-frames, but stopped and took off his weapons, and laid them on the bed. There was a Colt's revolver and a Smith & Wesson, each forty-five calibre. He also had in the room a Winchester repeating rifle, fourteen shots, and a breach-loading shot-gun.

As he turned away from the bed, we stepped between him and his weapons and pulled on him. I was about eight feet from him when he heard my pistol cock. He turned his head like lightning. I fired, the ball hitting over the left eye and coming out behind the right ear. Charlie had his fingers on the trigger, but saw he was done for, and did not shoot. Not one of us spoke a word. He fell dead at Charlie's feet. We then got our hats, went to the telegraph office, and telegraphed what we had done to Governor Crittenden, Capt. Henry Craig, of Kansas City, and Sheriff Timberlake, of Clay County. The latter replied: 'I will come at once. Stay there until I come.' '

CHAPTER LXVI.

JESSE IS REALLY DEAD—CONFLICTING OPINIONS CONCERNING BOB FORD—WHAT AN OLD IN-DEPENDENCE CONFEDERATE THINKS.

The newspapers of Tuesday morning, April 4th, created a world-wide and profound sensation. The tidings that the wildest freebooter since the days of Quantrell had been shot dead in his own house, awoke universal astonishment. All over the States and Territories of the Union, and especially in the Western regions, the news created a startling effect.

“At last,” men said,—and held their breath for a moment, and then, as if doubting the possibility of Jesse James’s complete defeat, suggested that the news would need a good deal of confirmation before it was accepted.

In St. Louis and Chicago the excitement was intense, and in the latter city, Pinkerton’s Detective Force were particularly hard of belief. When however the news was confirmed, Mr. Pinkerton smiled most blandly and said:

"All right! Then John Wicher is avenged at last!"

A stranger in the country might almost think that Jesse James was some great hero so great was the excitement occasioned by the tidings of his tragic end. Many and varied were the opinions expressed concerning his fate.

"Too bad! too bad!" said one, "after all his pluck and courage to be shot down like a dog at last!"

"Poor devil!" said another, "Bad as he was, he was clear grit, and only an infernal traitor would have done him the dirty trick!"

There is a wonderful power in death to smooth out the wrinkles of a bad life. And as at the wake of Tim O'Hara every one said

"Something good
Of the boy who was dead."

So there seemed to be an almost universal disposition to pity the man whose life had traveled through such bloody ways, and ended at last in such utter, hopeless gloom.

The trains that came into St. Joseph on Wednesday brought hundreds of people that wanted to take one look at the face of the murdered man.

Many staid and sober minded men felt that Bob Ford had done the State "good service," but just as nobody loves a policemen or an executioner, so there was a revolt of feeling, in favor of the murdered man and though it was generally felt that Missouri was well rid of Jesse James, yet the manner of his taking off was not admired. Even the devil should have his due, and it was felt that for Bob Ford to sneak into Jesse's house, and get into his confidence for no other purpose than to bring about his ruin and death was after all not very noble. One of the old members of the gang now at Independence gives his opinions on Bob Ford and the whole business very freely.

"What do you think of the killing of Jesse James?" was the question proposed to the old Independence confederate.

"I do not know what to think. I guess there is no mistake about it, and to tell the truth I have been expecting it for some time."

"Why?"

"Because Jesse was so infernally bold in his movements that he was bound to be caught napping some time."

"Did you expect him to go in this way?"

"Yes, of course; for I knew he would not be taken alive, and I also felt sure that his death would be accomplished by some member of the Gang I never expected, however, that Bob Ford would kill him. I always thought Jim Cummings would be the one to do the job."

"Why did you think of Cummings?"

"Because he and Jesse were terribly jealous of each other, and were continually having some kind of a fuss."

“Do you know Bob Ford?”

“Yes, and I tell you he is clear grit, if he is nothing but a boy. He isn't afraid of the devil himself, and would just as soon tackle him as not.”

“Was he connected with the Blue-cut robbery?”

“No, but his brother Charley was. Both were in the Winston robbery, and he also helped Dick Little kill Wood Hite.”

“What effect will the killing of Jesse have upon the Gang?”

“It will break it up, of course. Frank was the real head of the Gang, and did all the planning, but Jesse did the execution, and without him nothing can be done.”

“What about Jesse having lived in Kansas City for several months last year?”

“He lived on East Eighth street at the time of the Blue-cut robbery, and was at home and read a full account of the affair in the papers next morning. He was supposed to be a stock dealer, and he came to Cracker's Neck several times when making arrangements for the robbery on the pretense of buying cattle, and one time did drive a herd to the Kansas City stock yards.”

“Did the people of Cracker's Neck know him?”

“Some of them did, but were afraid to give him away, while others had no desire to betray him. He came and went when he pleased, and was always welcome.”

“What will Frank and Jim Cummings do now?”

"I think Frank will go to Texas and settle down. He is half dead from consumption, anyway, and I don't think he will live long. The excitement is all that has kept him up for more than a year. Jim Cummings is a treacherous scoundrel. I shouldn't wonder if he didn't try some scheme to secure a pardon by betraying Frank. He will never be able to organize a gang by himself as no one has any confidence in him."

"What do you think of the manner in which Jesse was killed?"

"It was a dirty, mean trick, but was the only way to get him. I am surprised that Jesse laid his revolvers down, for I never knew him to let them out of his reach before. Why, when he slept he always had a revolver in his hand, and the slightest noise would cause him to jump up straight in bed and cock his weapon ready for a fight. He was always afraid of being betrayed, and would never allow anyone to touch his pistols, or take them out of his hands. He was afraid of Jim Cummings, and would always make him eat and sleep apart from him."

"What effect will his death have upon you and your partners in the Blue-cut affair?"

"I don't know that it will have any, except to scare the boys. Bugler and Chapman are already frightened half to death for fear of being lynched. We are all gone up, and I don't see any use of making any fight about it."

“What about Dick Little’s statement that you were not in the Blue-cut robbery?”

“Little is a liar, and I think he has been hired to tell that by Bugler’s friends.”

SAMUELS BEGS THE BODY OF HER SON.

If Jesse James had been the greatest hero of the age, a view of his dead face could hardly have been sought for more diligently. From all quarters men and women, young and old, crowded around the undertakers, if by any chance they might catch one glimpse of a face that for years, had been a sign of terror and dread. Each train brought in fresh crowds to gaze upon the dead. Every entrance into St. Joseph was choked up with teams and buggies, heavily laden with people from all the country round, who had left their homes, and farms, and occupations, morbidly curious to see or hear something of the tragedy that had closed the red-handed career of Jesse.

On the morning of April 4th, Mrs. Samuels, the mother of Jesse, arrived upon the scene. She had left her home in Clay County with a heavy heart. Her life had been for years, one of agonizing suspense. Any time for the last eighteen years, the likeliest news to come to the Farm House, at Kearney, was that either Frank, or Jesse, or both, had become chief victims in some bloody tragedy. Many false reports of the death of Jesse, had, from time to time, distressed her. But she had unflinching confidence that Jesse would never be taken alive. And her confidence was well founded.

When the telegram reached her at Kearney announcing the death of her favorite son at the hand of Bob Ford, she shed no tears, she made no wild cry of anguish. She took in the whole situation at once, Jesse was dead, killed by a treacherous hand! And there stole over her aged face a pallor, and there gathered in her eyes an awful light that was indicative of an agony too deep for tears, an agony not unassociated with a spirit of bitter and merciless vengeance. She read the telegram again and again, and said in low half choked words:

“Shot by Bob Ford! Why did he trust him! Given away by Dick Little and shot by Bob! Traitors! Traitors!! Traitors!!!”

Mrs. Samuels arrived at St. Joseph at about 10 o'clock in the morning. Her interview with Jesse's wife and her little grandchildren was pathetic in the extreme. They clung about her and moaned and sobbed most piteously, as though they thought she had power to bring the dead man back to life. Still Mrs. Samuels shed no tears. But there was a stony glance in her eyes and a firm compression of the lips that bespoke an agony too deep for utterance. Even yet she could hardly realize that Jesse was dead. He had met death face to face so many times and had escaped, that it seemed hard to believe that at last he had been conquered.

The sorrowing women and children were driven to the undertaker's to view the body.

Arrived at Undertaker Sidenfader's, they found all that was mortal of Jesse laid on a plank. When Mrs. Samuels caught sight of Jesse's cold dead face, she almost swooned, and it was with great difficulty that she rallied.

"My poor boy! My dear son! My darling boy!" she sobbed aloud.

The sight was, indeed, sad. Three generations, mother, wife and children, wailing in unrestrained anguish around the dead man's bier. The sad-hearted mother was now convinced beyond a doubt. She admitted its identity and cried with deep emotion:

"Would to God it was not!"

From the undertaker's, Mrs. Samuels, Mrs. James and the children, were driven to the Court House, where they were to testify to Jesse's identity.

The Court Room was crowded to excess. Every available inch of space was occupied, and all the corridors and approaches were thronged by eager crowds.

The most intense interest was manifested, and the closest attention paid to the testimony.

H. H. CRAIG, Police Commissioner, of Kansas City, was the first witness sworn. He said: "The body corresponds with the description of Jesse James. I know the Fords. Bob Ford assisted Sheriff Timberlake and myself. Ford was not commissioned. Robert Ford acted through our instructions, and Charles was not acting under our instructions."

SHERIFF TIMBERLAKE testified that he was acquainted with Jesse James and recognized the body. They were personally acquainted. "Saw him last in 1870. I knew his face. He had a finger off. I told Ford to get his brother to assist him."

DICK LITTLE was sworn: "I have seen the body and recognize it as the body of Jesse James. I have no doubt of it. His general appearance is that of Jesse James. His finger is off, as James's was, and I recognize the scars in the side and thigh."

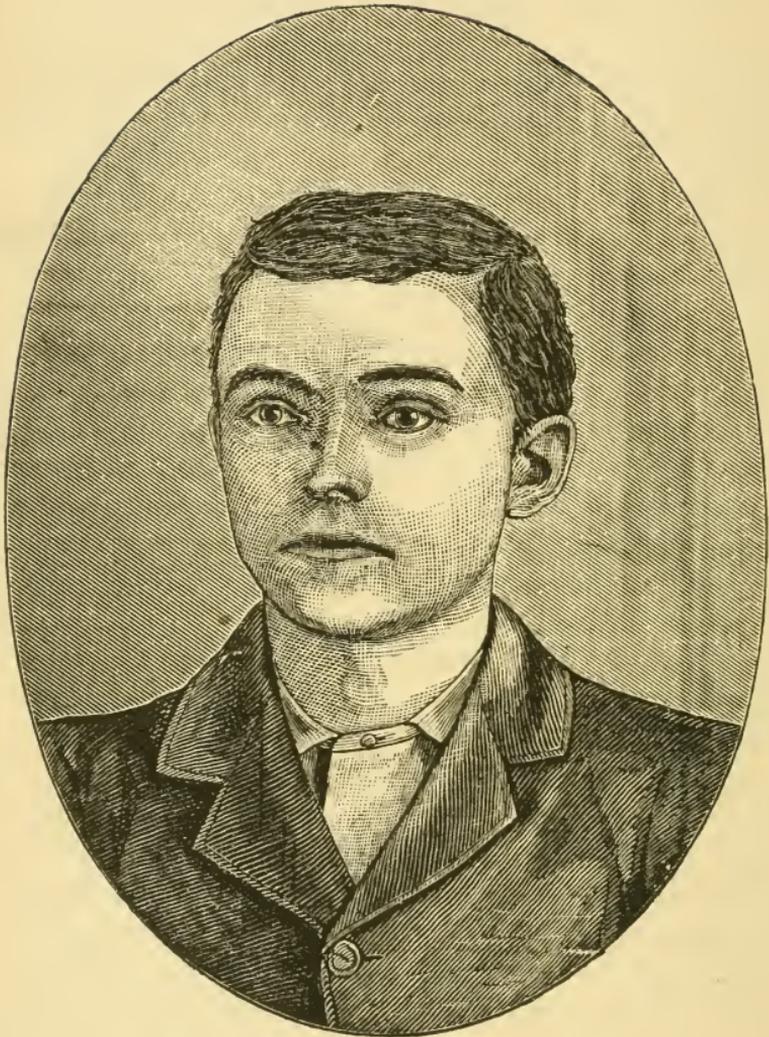

JAMES FINLEY testified, he was not acquainted with Jesse James. "I went to the house after the shooting and found two horses. I sent two officers after the Johnsons, as they were then called. Ford came and acknowledged the shooting. He described the wounds on the body, and claimed the man was Jesse James. Ford told me there were watches and jewelry at the house. I found watches, jewelry, pistols, cartridges, and a purse. I gave the purse to Mrs. James. It had some small change in

it. A scarf pin was found with the marks 'J. W. J.'"

MRS. SAMUELS, mother of Jesse, was then called. As she entered the room all eyes were turned upon her. Men stood on the seats, craned their necks, and used every endeavor to gain a view of the woman, who, although the mother of the outlaw, had the respect of every one in the room. She moved with a slow step and bowed head to the witness stand. She has a kindly face and eyes, and a rather prominent nose. She was dressed in black, with a black straw hat, and a black veil that partly covered her face. When she took the stand her face had a resolute appearance, but, as the examination progressed, that disappeared, and she was very much affected. She testified that she was the mother of Jesse James, and she had seen the body but a moment before. "Is that the body of your son?" asked the coroner. "It is," she answered, and then sobbed out: "Would to God it was not!" Placing her hands on the heads of the little son and daughter of Jesse James, who were standing in front of her, she continued, "And these are his orphan children." As she said this she was moved to tears. Mrs. James was asked to raise her veil, and, as she did so, Mrs. Samuels was asked if she recognized her. She answered that she did, and it was the widow of Jesse James.

MRS. JAMES testified that she recognized the preceding witness as Mrs. Samuels. Mrs. Samuels retired from the court-room.

ROBERT FORD,
The Man who Shot Jesse James.

The Jury retired for a very short time and brought in the following verdict:

“We, the jury, find that the deceased is Jesse James, and that he came to his death by a pistol-shot in the hands of Robert Ford.”

The two Ford boys were at once committed to jail charged with the murder of Jesse James, under a warrant sworn out by his wife.

Returning from the Court House, Mrs. Samuels confronted Dick Little, whose treachery seems to affect her quite as much as the actual deeds of the Ford Boys. She seems to think that but for Little's surrender, Jesse would not have been hunted to his death. Mrs. Samuels is a woman of 57 years of age. Her hair has grown gray, but when her eyes dilate with passion, her towering form assumes a terrible aspect. It was in a crushed and broken state of mind that Mrs. Samuels turned away from the inquest. Turning from the witness stand, her eyes rested on Dick Little standing in the aisle. All the tiger in her nature was roused in a moment.

“Traitor! Traitor! Traitor!” she exclaimed excitedly. “God will send vengeance on you for this. You are the cause of all this. O you villain! I would rather be in my poor boy's place than in yours.”

Dick cowered before her gaze and seemed to be in abject fear of the enraged woman, and, perhaps, it was just as well for him that she was not armed.

“I did not hurt him,” said Dick, “I thought you knew who killed him.”

“Oh! God! My poor boy, my poor boy!” She groaned out and left the Court room.

Mrs. Samuels begged for the body of her murdered son, and rumor avers that the agent who wanted to negotiate for Guiteau's body, put himself in communication with Mrs. Samuels and offered a very large sum for his remains. But this offer was in vain. Mrs. Samuels will bury her son in the old homestead at Kearney.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

THE LAST OF EARTH.

REMOVAL OF THE BODY OF JESSE JAMES TO KEARNEY
—THRONGS ON THE WAY—ARRIVAL AT HIS EARLY HOME—THE SERVICE IN THE BAPTIST CHURCH—ASHES TO ASHES.

The body of Jesse James was given over to his widow for interment. In accordance with the wishes of his mother, it was arranged that he should be buried in the old homestead at Kearney. The spot that had sheltered him in a thousand days of peril, was now to be his last long resting-place. The remains were enclosed in a magnificent casket with silver adornments, the cost of which amounted to $500. The funeral cortege left St. Joseph for Cameron at sunset on April the 5th, and was in charge of Marshal Craig of St. Joseph. The members of the mourning family consisted of Mrs. Samuels, Mrs. James, the two children, Mr. L. W. James, cousin of Jesse, and Mr. R. T. Minims, the brother of Jesse's widow. Some difficulty had occurred through an official desire to have the body sent on to Kansas City. But Sheriff Timberlake and the local authorities prevailed, and the body was formally handed over to Mrs. James by Coroner Heddins on an order of the Grand Jury of Buchanan county, and the dispatch of Governor Crittenden.

It is believed that an autopsy was held over the body of Jesse James, but the physicians decline to give any information on the subject.

The train left St. Joseph about 6 o'clock in the evening. An immense concourse gathered at the depot to catch a glimpse of the coffined Bandit as he started on his last railway ride. A carriage drove up and Mrs. Samuels stepped out, and leaning on the arm of an officer proceeded to the train, followed by a gaping crowd. She was exceedingly anxious to see the body safely on board. She was not content till she had been to the baggage car and had seen the coffin herself.

While in the depot, a short, thick-set man tried to fire a pistol at Mrs. Samuels, but was promptly seized and driven ignominiously out of the depot into the street. At all the stations along the road crowds gathered, moved by morbid curiosity to see what might be seen of the funeral procession.

The train reached Cameron about 9 o'clock, and a large crowd filled the depot and its surroundings. The bereaved family were conducted to a waiting room to await a special train that was to take the body on to Kearney. The box containing the coffin was strictly guarded by a member of the family, who was importuned in vain to open the coffin that the curious crowd might take a last look at Jesse. The train left Cameron shortly after midnight. And just as the spring morning was breaking faintly over the scenes of his early years, Jesse's last journey on earth came to an end. The remains were conveyed at once to the Kearney Hotel, where they lay in rude state in a front room of the hotel from 6 o'clock to 10 o'clock, during which time more than fifteen hundred people viewed the dead desperado.

The services at the church took place at 2 P. M., and were conducted by Rev. G. M. Martin, assisted by Rev. G. R. Jones. The ordinary obsequies were conducted, interspersed with vocal music. Rev. Mr. Martin delivered the address, and his only reference to the character of the dead man was to say that it was too well known to need any comment. Without any expression of opinion regarding the spiritual outlook of the outlaw, he spoke only of the chances of the living and the lesson taught by the death.

About five hundred people were in the church and an immense crowd gathered outside who could not gain admittance. At the close of the service Mr. Martin stated to the audience that, owing to the severe illness of John Samuels, all but the near relatives of the deceased were requested not to follow the body to the grave. The corpse was then taken to the Samuels' homestead. When the short procession reached that place, a crowd was found to have assembled who had not been at the church. At the southwest corner of the one-acre tract that comprises the Samuels homestead a grave had been dug.

After a brief prayer the body was lowered into the ground, and the sounds of the clods of earth falling on the coffin told the crowd that had assembled that Jesse James had left the sight of the world forever.

Mrs. Samuels was greatly distressed. In the old farm house a younger son of Mrs. Samuels lay dangerously ill, while in the corner of the home lot Jesse's grave looked spectral as the sunset tinged the new made mound with lurid beams. She clings to the hope that Jesse is at rest and in peace,

“ After life's fitful fever
He sleeps well.”

THE FATE OF THE FORD BOYS.

Justice has been as swift and certain in her dealing with the Ford boys, as she has been laggard and uncertain in the case of Guiteau.

Charles and Robert Ford were arraigned before Judge Sherman, at St. Joseph, Mo., on Monday, the 17th of April. The court room was, of course, crowded. The prisoners seemed to be wholly unconcerned, and took the whole proceedings as mere formal business.

Prosecuting - Attorney Spencer read the indictment charging the prisoners with murder in the first degree. Both prisoners pleaded guilty without a moment's hesitation. The suddenness of the plea and the unconcerned manner of the prisoners took Judge Sherman somewhat aback. After a brief pause the Judge passed sentence of death upon both prisoners in the following words:

“Under the circumstances, there is only one thing I can do, and that is to pronounce sentence here and now. You have pleaded guilty to murder in the first degree, and it only remains for me to carry out the provisions of the law. It remains for others to say whether the sentence is carried out. Robert Ford, stand up.”

Robert did as commanded.

“Have you anything to say why sentence should not be pronounced upon you.”

“Nothing,” responded the prisoner.

“Robert Ford,” said the judge, “you have pleaded guilty before this court to the crime of murder in the first degree, and it becomes my duty to pass the sentence of death upon you. It is therefore the sentence of this court that you be taken to the Buchanan county jail, and there safely kept until the 19th day of May, 1882, and at that time to be taken to a convenient place and hanged by the neck till you are dead.”

Robert then took his seat, and Charles was commanded to stand up. The same sentence was then passed upon him, and then the two were taken back to the jail.

On the morning of the 18th, an unconditional pardon was issued for both the Fords, by Gov. Thomas T. Crittenden. Sheriff Thomas at once liberated the boys, who shook hands with the guards and many of the spectators. Robert's liberty was very short-lived. The smile of complacency had hardly faded from his face, when Sheriff Trigg, of Ray County, placed his hand upon Robert Ford and said “You are my prisoner!”

He then read a warrant for his arrest, charging him with the murder, or complicity in the murder of Wood Hite, whose body was found a week or ten days ago, in an old well, on the Ford farm.

Ford was evidently taken aback, and with a heavy sigh he said, “Is that so?”

In a brief conversation he asserted his perfect innocence in the matter, and, after the first surprise of the arrest was over, he did not manifest any uneasiness. Sheriff Trigg took his prisoner to Kansas City, and thence to Richmond, where he will be speedily tried.

Charles Ford was permitted to go free.

JESSE'S ARMORY.

After the trial, Mrs. Jesse James went from Kearney to St. Joseph, where the guns, revolvers, and other paraphernalia of the bandit's life, held in charge by Marshal Craig, were, by the order of Gov. Crittenden, handed over to Jesse's widow. The armory is said to be worth from $500 to $700.

IN MEMORIAM—JESSE JAMES.

The following dirge, published in the Chicago Times of April 19th, may serve to show that there are not a few who regard the dead bandit as a hero:

Sadly, in the early Spring time
Did we lay him away to rest,
Away from this cold, unfeeling clima.
Safe away among the blest.

No more now will he be hunted
By his enemies so bad,
All his young life abruptly blunted,
Ah! 'tis sad, 'tis very sad!

Why did they kill him thus? So sudden
Why pin him on death's awful lance?
Why pluck the flower just in its budding,
Why didn't they give poor Jesse a chance?

How much worse were they who killed him,
The brand of Cain is on their brow,
Oh how sad that they have stilled him;
But Jesse is in Abram's bosom now.

His sisters, children, wife and mother,
Shed their tears like floods of rain—
And his poor, wandering brother,
We may never see again.

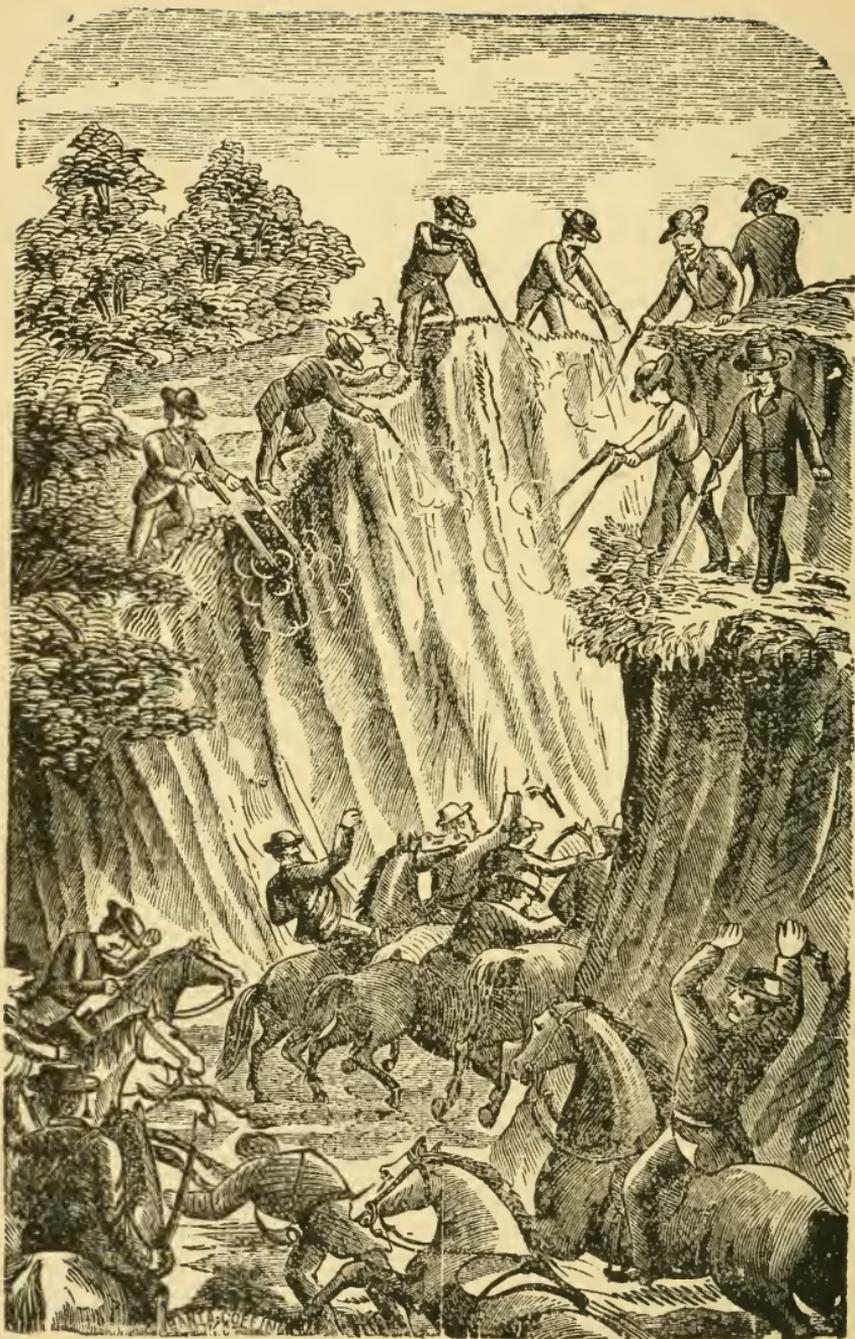

Oh! this is bitter, bitter, bitter—
That the Lord should permit such wrong,
Think now of the lonely sitter—
His mother singing out her wailing song.

Of her sainted boy gone before,
Gone and left them all behind,
Weeping tears of sorrow so sore,
Wafted to him on the wind.

Rest thee, Jesse, rest thee, rest,
Know thy friends down here below,
While thou art in the land that's blest,
Will not forget the terrible blow.

They feel that thou lookest from above
In that land of peace and beauty,
And wilt give them thy own richest love
If they will do their duty.

Farewell, farewell, we see you there
Beckoning with thy own dear hand;
And with the angels ever bright and fair,
We will meet you in that heavenly land!

INTRODUCTION.

In coming before the public with a work of this character, the author deems it unnecessary to offer an apology for its appearance. The names of the principal characters herein mentioned, the Younger Brothers, are familiar to every reader of newspapers throughout the country. This volume is not a romance, drawn from imagination, but a plain, unvarnished history of facts and incidents that have actually occurred, the names herein given being real, not fictitious, and nearly all of whom are living at this time.

The author of this book has been a resident of St. Clair county, Missouri, the past four years. This county is, or at least has been, partially the home of the Younger Brothers, ever since the late war, and at the present time they have many relatives and intimate friends residing here, with most of whom I am personally acquainted, and from whom I have obtained much of the subject matter in this book. I have also had several interviews with the Younger Brothers, in regard to the various charges made against them. I have devoted much time during the past eighteen months in getting up this history, ever keeping in view truth and impartiality. But few persons know the whereabouts of the Younger Brothers at any time, where they go or when they will return. And those who have their confidence seldom allow themselves to be drawn into conversation about them. Thus it will be seen that it is no easy matter to obtain reliable information in regard to them.

It is not my desire or wish to shield these men from any depredations they may have committed, or to in the least influence public opinion in their favor, but simply to give facts and incidents in connection with their lives, leaving the public to judge for themselves of the manner of men they are, and of their guilt or innocence of the many crimes charged against them.

As the reader is aware, almost the entire newspaper press of the country has, from time to time, during the past few years, devoted much time and space to these notable characters, while many of the articles which have found their way into the columns of leading journals throughout the country, North, South, East and West, were the grossest misrepresentations. Every species of rascality and deviltry committed in Missouri and adjoining States, has either been charged upon them directly, or they were accused of belonging to the band of outlaws who perpetrated the crimes, and shared in the spoils, while it was known to many persons in Missouri and elsewhere, that the Younger Brothers were hundreds of miles away from the scenes of lawlessness at the time, and were innocent of any complicity in the crime. That these men are brave and daring fellows, no one acquainted with them will deny. It cannot be said that they court danger, but never avoid it when fairly met. Their lives, from early boyhood, have been one

A little over twelve months ago one of these boys, John Younger, was killed in an encounter with two of Pinkerton's Chicago Detectives, near Monegaw Springs, St. Clair county, Missouri. From that time until the present, at least so far as the public have had any knowledge of them, the Younger Brothers have not been in any difficulty, and but little has been said about them, save that they were seen in different parts of the country, yet when the reader comes to peruse this work he will find that for several months thereafter the remaining three brothers were engaged in almost every-day fighting, having been pursued and hunted down like wild beasts. These facts we gathered from one of their most intimate friends, to whom the boys related their trials and difficulties.

In the preparation of this work, at times, we have endeavored to give, as near as possible, the exact language of the boys in relating incidents in their lives, making it just what it is intended to be, a plain, unvarnished history of things that occurred during and since the war. The intimate friends of these boys have always claimed that they did nothing more than what was either forced upon them by personal enemies, or resulted from bad feeling growing out of the late war—the murdering of their father in cold blood, by a band of Jayhawkers, and then robbing him of a considerable amount of money; the brutal and inhuman treatment received by their widowed mother, &c.

Three of these boys are still living, namely, Thomas Coleman, James Henry and Robert Ewing Younger.

In conclusion, believing that the public mind was ripe for a reliable work of this kind, this volume is presented. The leading characters are the Younger Brothers, yet the reader will find that other noted persons are referred to, such as Quantrell, a famous bushwhacker during the war, the James Boys, Arthur McCoy, &c., and, taken together, will go to make up much of the unwritten history of the late war, both in Missouri and Kansas, as also the leading incidents of outlawry the past six years in the West.

The author of this work possesses facilities for obtaining reliable information in regard to the Younger Brothers, enjoyed by but few, and much of the matter herein contained was sketched by Cole Younger himself, and merely written out more in detail. This is the only work giving the lives of these men ever published.

THE AUTHOR.

OSCEOLA, St. Clair County, Mo.

HENRY W. YOUNGER.

Col. Henry Washington Younger, father of the Younger Brothers, was born in Crab Orchard, Kentucky. He moved to Missouri with his father when quite a young man, settling in Jackson county. About the year 1830 he married Miss Busheba Fristo. The union thus formed proved a happy and contented one, both parties being greatly attached to each other, and they raised a very large family of children, fourteen in number, eight girls and six boys. All, save three, lived until they grew to womanhood and manhood.

Col. Younger figured conspicuously in politics, and was for a number of years Judge of the County Court of Jackson county, and at one time a member of the Missouri Legislature.

The names of the boys who lived to the age of majority were Richard, Thomas Coleman, James Henry, John and Robert Ewing Younger. All but two of the girls reached womanhood, and nearly all married men of standing and wealth, four of whom are now living in different parts of the country.

Col. Henry W. Younger continued to reside in Jackson county, Missouri, until 1858, when he moved near Harrisonville, in Cass county, Missouri. He was a very active business man. He dealt largely in stock, was quite an extensive farmer, and largely engaged in merchandising. In 1861 he had a large livery stable in Harrisonville, and owned some of the best blooded stock in the west. He was very successful in business, and at the time of his death was thought to be worth over $100,000, which, at that time was considered, in that section of country, a very wealthy man. He owned two large and highly improved farms, one of about 600 acres in Jackson county, ten miles south of Independence, Missouri, and one adjoining the town of Harrisonville, in Cass county, Missouri. He also carried on merchandising in Harrisonville.

When the war broke out Col. Younger was a staunch Union man. The Kansas troubles, a few years previous to the late "unpleasantness" between the Northern and Southern States, created considerable ill-feeling between the citizens on the borders of Kansas and Missouri, growing out of the attempt, on the part of Missourians, to make Kansas a slave State. This sectional feeling continued to ripen and increase, from year to year, and the breaking out of the war caused an open rupture all along the line between those States. The Missourians who took part in this matter were termed Guerrillas, while those of Kansas were designated Jayhawkers. The Jayhawkers, as is well known, were headed by Jim Lane, Jennison, Montgomery, Anthony, etc., whose names, years ago, before the late war, were familiar to the country. To the Guerrillas, anything across the Kansas border was lawful prey, while the Jayhawkers of Kansas knew no distinction among the people of Missouri. With the echo of the first gun fired on Fort Sumpter, the dogs of war were let loose all along the Missouri and Kansas border. Jennison and his band of Jayhawkers went through Jackson and other border counties of Missouri, sacking and burning, while the Missourians, under the lead of Quantrell, finally sacked and burned the town of Lawrence, Kansas.

Jennison, in one of his raids into Missouri, passed through Jasper, Jackson and Cass counties, going as far as the town of Harrisonville, at which time he sacked and burned most of the town, then the home of Col. Henry W. Younger, who, although a firm Union man, was one of Jen-nison's special victims. Several thousand dol-lars worth of vehicles from his extensive livery stable were carried off, and forty head of blooded horses were confiscated, making his loss on this single occasion about $20,000. Col. Harry Younger, however, managed to escape the clutches of the Jayhawkers.

From that time on, Col. Younger was shad-owed from place to place, and being a very wealthy man, who usually carried with him large amounts of money, the Jayhawkers intended, the first opportunity, to murder and rob him. About the first of September, 1862, it became known that he would come into possession of a considerable amount of money, and that he was to go to Independence on a certain day to get it and bring it to Harrisonville. He went, in his buggy, at the appointed time, and parties laid in wait for him to return. Accordingly, when near Harrisonville, he was halted by about ten men, shot dead in his buggy, then robbed and left lying in the road. Previous to starting, Col. Younger had taken the precaution to place in his belt, which he carried buckled around his body underneath his clothing, all of his money except four hundred dollars, which he placed in his pocketbook. This the Jayhawkers got, not supposing he had any more with him. When his murder became known, the body was given in charge of his wife, and on preparing it for decent burial, the remainder of his money was found in the belt where he had placed it, which was taken charge of by his wife.

At another time the widow, and mother of a large family of children, was forced to fire her own house with her own hands at midnight, the flames arising from which lit up the road as the Jayhawkers rode of. From that time on, the Youngers were considered outlawed; one of the boys, Thomas Coleman Younger, shortly after joining the forces of Quantrell, and making it lively for Jayhawkers wherever he came across them.

After the burning of the house in Cass county, the mother gathered together her small children in a mere shanty in Lafayette county, Missouri, where she passed the winter. The Jayhawkers followed her trail as hunters would that of a she wolf and her cubs. One night they surrounded the shanty, with the hope of finding the older boy, Thomas Coleman, at home, and failing in that, they chased into the brush the next oldest, James Henry, then only fourteen years of age.

From Lafayette county the remaining helpless members of the family were driven into Clay county. Finally, shortly after the close of the war, the mother sickened and died, the result of the troubles and trials she had undergone.

RICHARD YOUNGER.

Richard Younger was the oldest son of Henry W. Younger. He died in Jackson county, Missouri, in 1860, and was burried with Masonic honors, being a worthy member of the brotherhood, aged about 23 years. He died shortly after graduating, and those who knew him, regarded him as a very promising young man, and one who possessed considerable ability for his age. Had he lived, he, doubtless, would have endured many of the trials and hardships which fell to the lot of his younger brothers. For resentment is characteristic of human nature, and it is not reasonable to suppose that, had he lived, he would have sat quietly by and seen or known of his father being rusthlessly murdered and robbed, by a band of Jayhawkers; his mother insulted, abused, and compelled to fire her own house, driven from place to place, and at length filling an untimely grave, without resenting some of the wrongs that were committed upon his parents. Such would be human nature.

THOMAS COLEMAN YOUNGER.

Much has been said and written about the person whose name heads this chapter. The newspapers of the country have contained column after column, the productions of correspondents and editors, who gave what was claimed to be the whole unvarnished truth, while the reading public eagerly grasped after everything written and published about him. Thousands, it is to be presumed, imagined in their own minds what sort of a creature he must needs be. Indeed, we have seen men who, we thought, had more and better sense, assert that they would as soon meet a grizzly bear as Cole Younger; and men have actually avoided passing through St. Clair county, Missouri, for fear they would meet some of the Youngers. These things very much remind one of the imaginations of persons living East, some twenty-five or thirty years ago, who never were West, who could not believe that in the great West there were any real comforts and enjoyments; who imagined that there was an Indian lurking behind every tree or rock, with rifle or bow and arrow in hand, ready to shoot down every white man that dared to venture across the Mississippi river, West; who could not believe but what the white people who were then living West, were more like wild beasts than human beings, roaming over the wild prairies in search of the buffalo and deer, clothed only in the skins of wild animals, and who could relish raw meat as well as civilized and intelligent people meat that was properly cooked and prepared. Thousands there are at the present day, who can well remember these things, and we have no doubt there are thousands still living, who have never been West, who have very erroneous ideas of Western life and Western people; who cannot properly realize the fact that in the great West we have large and handsome cities, possessing every advantage and every facility for enjoyment and pleasure, and in which are stores that would be a credit and ornament to any Eastern city, filled with the most costly articles of merchandise. In fact the West is the place to find every convenience and luxury the world affords.

Those who doubt the truth of this, we advise to come West and see for themselves.

A few months since a Chicago paper contained quite a lengthy account of the cruel manner in which Cole Younger was treated by the Jayhawkers at Harrisonville, Cass county, Missouri, in 1861. The whole story was one of wild imagination, without the least semblance of truth in it. Cole Younger never was captured during the war, neither was he ever hung up, whipped, or harmed in any way, although he would, undoubtedly, have been killed, had he not left home the very day he did.

Cole Younger remained at home until the fall or winter of 1861, when Neugent's men were stationed at Harrisonville, in Cass county, Missouri, having up to this time taken no part or lot in the war that was then going on. He frequently visited parties where the Missouri State Militia were, and all went pleasantly and smoothly along. At one of these parties, however, which was held at the house of Col. McKee, a little jealousy seemed to spring up between Cole Younger and a militia Captain named Irvin Walley. A sister of Cole Younger, who was present at the party, refused to dance with Walley, which nettled him very much. Cole Younger, on this occasion, seemed to enjoy himself very much, more than usual, and monopolized the time and attention of the belle of the evening, much to the chagrin and mortification of Walley, who conceived the idea that because he ranked as a militia Captain he was superior to any citizen or common soldier. Walley seemed uneasy the whole evening, and showed signs of a determination to create a difficulty with Cole Younger. Finally, Walley was heard to make the remark that "Soldiers would stand no chance until they took that d——n Younger boy out." This information being told to Younger, he became satisfied that his presence was creating bad feeling, and that he was not wanted there, and he finally withdrew and went home, hoping thereby to avoid a difficulty, and thus be enabled to remain at home, assist his father in business and keep clear of the war. Even after he left the house Walley seemed not to be satisfied, but threatened death to Cole Younger.

When Cole Younger reached home he told his father what had happened, and said he feared the end was not yet, as Walley seemed determined to have a difficulty. His father then advised him to go down on the farm in Jackson county and raise a crop, thinking that when there he would be secure from the enmity of Walley, and be able to live in peace.

The following night Walley and a party of his men went to the house of Col. Henry Younger and made some violent demonstrations, threatening to "Show Cole Younger how the dancing went," but Cole had left that day, and thus, in all probability, avoided being killed, or killing some one.

Capt. Walley soon learned that Cole Younger had gone to Jackson county, and at once determined to report him as having joined Quantrell, thus hoping to get up an excuse to perpetrate some deviltry and accomplish what he desired. As the sequel afterwards proved, the object of Walley was to stir up strife and give him an excuse for robbing Col. Harry Younger, father of Cole. All this time Cole Younger was busily engaged on the farm in Jackson county, not suspecting trouble or danger. But he was not long to remain in peace and quietude, and at length learned that he was being hunted down by Capt. Walley, who had reported him as being with Quantrell. He felt satisfied that Walley would endeavor to come upon him sometime when he was not suspecting danger, and probably murder him in cold blood. Finally, one day he learned that Walley, with his company of Missouri State Militia, was then on the way from Harrisonville to Jackson county, intending, as it had been given out, to capture Cole Younger, a noted bushwhacker. Younger, at this time, was inexperienced in war, and could devise no better means of escaping the clutches of Capt. Walley than to take to the brush, well knowing that he could keep out of his way, if nothing else. He also hoped that Neugent's men would be removed in a short time, and that then his troubles would end. He was without arms, and of course was unable to do harm. In this condition, young, inexperienced, and having no ill-will towards any one, he managed to secrete himself among his relatives for some two or three weeks. During this time Colonel Younger, his father, was endeavoring to settle the pretended difficulty, (on the part of Walley,) between him and Cole, so that Cole could come home and remain in peace and quiet. But Neugent and Walley were both intent on plunder, and well knowing they could make no reasonable excuse for robbing Col. Harry Younger, who was a staunch Union man, they resolved to make a scape-goat of Cole and drive him to desperation, thereby finding a poor apology of an excuse for robbing the old gentleman, who was thought to be the wealthiest man in that section of the State, and at all times having considerable money on his person and about his house.

One day Capt. Walley went to the livery stable of Col. Harry Younger and hired a buggy and pair of fine match horses, promising to return them in a day or two. After gaining possession of them he refused to give them up, and appropriated the whole outfit to his own use. Almost simultaneous with this movement, a raid was made on Younger's Jackson county farm, for the purpose, as it was given out, of capturing Cole Younger, but really with the view of plunder. Cole was not there, at least they did not find him, but they did not hesitate to drive off all the stock and set fire to the grain bins. Col. Harry Younger made but little complaint after the loss and destruction of his property, but continued to manifest a great desire to make some disposition of Cole that would save trouble, as he well knew that if the boy once became thoroughly aroused, already observing that the "tiger" was being developed in him, that serious consequences would follow. His father advised him to remain quiet and he would yet make some disposition of him to keep him out of trouble. He told his father that he "was tired of running like a wild beast, and would not do it much longer without hurting some one." The old gentleman then suggested that he had better go to school. To this Cole assented.

At once arrangements were made with that object in view, and clothing and the usual outfit prepared for him. Col. Younger named his plan of keeping Cole out of trouble to a friend in Kansas City, and was surprised to learn that his intentions had been anticipated and were known. His friend informed him that he was closely watched, and advised him not to attempt it, as it might result fatally to himself. On his return home Col. Younger informed Cole of these facts, and then, for the first time, he seemed fully aroused, saying, "It's all right, I will fight them awhile, then!"

HE JOINS QUANTRELL.

Cole Younger had frequently heard of Quantrell, and at once determined to risk his chances with him, and immediately started in search of his camp, finding him on the Little Blue, in Jackson county, Missouri. He went without arms, but remained only a short time before a fight occurred, at which time he succeeded in getting arms from a dead Federal. Thus, on the 20th of April, 1862, Coleman Younger was, for the first time, an armed soldier.

JOINS THE CONFEDERATE ARMY.

Early in the fall of 1864, during the last raid of Gen. Price into Missouri, Cole Younger joined the Confederate Army and went South with Price on his return. He was afterwards elected Captain of a company, and the following winter took his men and went into Louisiana, where he remained until the close of the war, which was in the spring of 1865.

GOES TO MEXICO.

After the close of the war Cole Younger and fifteen of the men belonging to his company went to Mexico. After remaining in Mexico about two months, he and several of the men sailed for California, the others taking the overland route for the same point. Cole remained in California until the fall of 1866, when he returned to the States, stopping in Jackson county, Missouri, near Blue Mills, on the farm of his mother, and went to work making rails, the greater portion of the fencing having been destroyed during the war. John and Robert were at home when he arrived, but James had not yet returned, having been captured in Kentucky with Quantrell, at the time Quantrell was mortally wounded and captured. James returned shortly afterwards, however, and all the boys went to work to fix up the farm.

AT HOME.

As previously mentioned, Cole Younger returned home from California in the fall of 1866, as did also James. They had not been home long until the Missouri Militia, together with the Kansas Jayhawkers, who then held all the offices in the border counties, began to organize into bands or Vigilant Committees, as some termed them, for the purpose of intimidating those of the opposition, and eventually driving them from their homes. Their ears were continually assailed with threats of murder and mob violence. By the following spring it became absolutely dangerous, for Cole Younger especially, to stay at home, and he then left and went to Lee's Summit, in order to be out of the way and avoid assassination. Becoming tired of loitering around town idle, shortly afterwards he went to Louisiana, where he remained during the summer of 1867. In the meantime, James, John and Robert remained at home and cultivated their mother's farm.

In the fall Cole, thinking that probably the bitter feeling against him had subsided, returned home and went to work on the farm. He built his mother a house, fixed the place up as best he could, and prepared to live with her the remnant of her days. Cole bore no ill-will toward any one, and was willing to "bury the hatchet" and forget the past. But not so with his enemies. There was but a short respite. The old and bitter feeling against Quantrell's men, the "bushwackers," as they were commonly called, began to manifest itself in acts of violence. As heretofore mentioned, all the offices of honor, profit or trust, under the then semi-civil, semi-military rule in the border counties, were held by Kansas Jayhawkers and the old Missouri State Militia, of Neugent's regiment. These men nursed a deadly hatred against every one of Quantrell's men, especially against those who were most prominent and officers, such as Cole Younger had been. The Jayhawkers, under the shadow of official authority, committed murder with impunity. This gave them a fine opportunity to take revenge upon their personal enemies, and they improved the opportunity. They murdered William, commonly called "Bill" Reynolds, Al. Shepherd, and others of Quantrell's men. They arrested George Maddox and Paine Jones, sent them to Lawrence, Kansas, and incarcerated them in a filthy jail for many months, without a shadow of a charge against them, except that they had served under Quantrell and followed his fortunes through the war.

Dick Burns was murdered, and Bill Hulse was shot down while at work in a harvest field, and left for dead. Thus, one by one, Quantrell's men were disposed of, until it was apparent that there would be none left to tell the tale. At length there was organized at Pleasant Hill, in Cass county, a company of those Jayhawkers, under the command of one Timberlick, a Kansas red-leg, and who was at the time acting as Deputy Sheriff, under one R. S. Judy, one of Neugent's militia, and who had an implacable hatred against Cole Younger. The company was made up of the very worst men in that vicinity; men who were ever ready to perpetrate almost any crime, murder not excepted. They designed to capture, and doubtless murder, Cole Younger. They passed through Lee's Summit one day, creating a reign of terror in that little town, and went to the widow Wiginton's and took her son George, another of Quantrell's men, abused him shamefully, and then took him along with them as a guide and decoy, through whom they hoped to capture Cole Younger. Fortunately for him, and perhaps for some of them, Cole was not at home at the time, but three miles away, at the house of his brother-in-law. They then abused the family and compelled them to get supper for them, after which they left, taking with them John Younger, then a mere boy, whom they thought they could force to tell the whereabouts of Cole Younger. They threw a rope around his neck, beat him with their pistols, and otherwise maltreated him, yet they failed to force him to give them any information. Such treatment as this is what forced James and John to leave home.

Another similar attempt to capture and murder Cole Younger was made by a party hailing from Independence, with a like result. Cole saw that it was impossible for him to live at home in peace. And the other boys had been so ill treated that they, too, were afraid to stay at home, and finally Cole took the other two boys, James and John, and started for Texas, where he prepared a home for his mother and sister, to which he intended to remove them, together with a black woman, Sue, who had remained faithful and true to them through all their trials and troubles, and is, to this day. In the meantime their mother, who was not able to go to Texas with them, and who never did recover from her illness, consumption; had to break up housekeeping, and, with her little girl and negro woman, went to live with her son-in-law, where she finally wasted away, and died at the residence of Lycurgus Jones, in June, 1870, while her sons were far away preparing a home for her in her old age.

Coleman and James returned during the summer and took their sister and the negro woman to Texas, where we shall leave them for the present.

In February, 1875, Thomas Coleman Younger was 32 years of age.

FIGHT AT A HORSE RACE IN LOUISIANA.

In 1869 Cole Younger, in the course of one of his roving freaks, found himself in one of the interior parishes of Louisiana, and attended a horse race. The great, gaunt, awkward Missourian had money with him, the result of a successful cattle speculation. The crowd intuitively recognized the presence of the money, and fixed upon Cole Younger for their prey. They badgered him, pressed around him with sharp words, and finally forced the borderer into the horse race. Younger had one of the famous long limbed, blue grass breed of racers, an animal not fair to look upon, but of great speed and bottom. He put every dollar he had upon his horse—$700. The money was placed in the hands of a storekeeper close by the track. All the time that Younger was preparing for the race, the crowd pressed around, flinging insulting epithets and abusive suggestions at their victim. The Missourian muttered a request that they should wait until after the race for the shooting to begin, but the crowd paid no attention. Finally Cole Younger announced his readiness, and at the word the horses were off. As they came in on the last quarter, Younger's horse was four lengths ahead, when out from the crowd sprang one of the bullies with a wild yell and flaunted in the face of the winning steed a cloth. The horse swerved, lost his stride, and came in second. Younger's light blue eyes glistened a little, but he said not a word. He dismounted, groomed his horse, and then, remounting, rode to the stakeholder and said: "You saw what happened, and don't mean to give that fellow my money." With an imprecation, the man in league with the crowd replied that he did. "Then," said Cole Younger, "the shooting has commenced." The crowd had gathered about him, laughing at his defeat, and hooting in derision. Out from their holsters came two dragoon revolvers, and with one in each hand Cole Younger emptied them with inconceivable rapidity into the mob and then, without waiting to see the effects, dashed away. Three of the crowd were killed outright, two died of their wounds, and five carry to this day, if they are all living, the scars of that terrible revenge.

WRITES A LETTER VINDICATING HIMSELF.

The Pleasant Hill, Missouri Review, of the 26th of November, 1874, contained the following letter from Thomas Coleman Younger, in which he endeavors to vindicate himself from the charges made against him, as follows:

HIS LETTER.

“DEAR CURG:—You may use this letter in your own way. I will give you this outline and sketch of my whereabouts and actions at the time of certain robberies with which I am charged. At the time of certain bank robberies, I was gathering cattle in Ellis county, Texas, cattle that I bought from Pleas Taylor and Rector. This can be proven by both of them; also by Sheriff Barkley and fifty other respectable men of that county. I brought the cattle to Kansas that fall and remained in St. Clair county until February. I then went to Arkansas and returned to St. Clair county about the first of May. I went to Kansas where our cattle were, in Woodson county, at Col. Ridge's. During the summer I was either in St. Clair, Jackson or Kansas, but as there was no robbery committed that summer, it makes no difference where I was.

The gate at the fair grounds in Kansas City was robbed that fall. I was in Jackson county at the time I left R. P. Rose's that morning, went down Independence road, stopped at Dr. Nolan's and got some pills. Brother John was with me. I went through Independence, from there to Ace Webb's. There I took dinner and then went to Dr. L. W. Twiman's. Staid there until after supper, then went to Silas Hudspeth's and staid all night. This was the day the gate was robbed at Kansas City. Next day John and I went to Kansas City. We crossed the river at Blue Mills, and went upon the other side. Our business there was to see E. P. West. He was not at home, but the family will remember that we were there. We crossed on the bridge, stayed in the city all night, and the next morning we rode up through the city. I met several of my friends; among them was Bob Hudspeth. We then returned to the Six-mile country by the way of Independence. At Big Blue we met James Chiles and had a long talk with him. I saw several friends that were standing at or near the gate, and they all said they didn't know any of the party that did the robbing. Neither John nor I were accused of the crime for several days after. My name would never have been used in connection with this affair, had not Jesse W. James, for some cause, best known to himself, published in the Kansas City Times, a letter stating that John, myself and he were accused of the robbery. Where he got his authority, I don't know, but one thing I do know, he had none from me. We were not on good terms at the time, nor haven't been for several years. From that time on, mine and John's name has been connected with the James brothers. John hadn't seen either of them for eighteen months before his death. And as for A. C.

McCoy, John never saw him in his life. I knew A. C. McCoy during the war, but have't seen him since, notwithstanding the Appleton City papers say he has been with us in that county for two years. Now, if any respectable man in that county will say he ever saw A. C. McCoy with me or John, I will say no more; or if any respectable man will say that he ever saw any one with us who suited the description of A. C. McCoy, then I will be silent and never more plead innocent.

McCoy is 48 or 49 years old; 6 feet and over in height; dark hair and blue eyes, and low forehead.

Poor John, he has been hunted down and shot like a wild beast, and never was a boy more innocent. But there is a day coming when the secrets of all hearts will be laid open before that All-seeing eye, and every act of our lives will be scrutinized, then will his skirts be white as the driven snow, while those of his accusers will be doubly dark.

I will now come to the St. Genevieve robbery. At that time I was in St. Clair county, Missouri. I do not remember the date, but Mr. Murphy, one of our neighbors, was sick about that time, and I sat up with him regularly, where I met with some of the neighbors every day. Dr. L. Lewis was his physician.

As to the Ohio train robbery, I have forgotten the day, I was also in St. Clair county, Missouri, at that time, and had the pleasure of attending preaching the evening previous to the robbery, at Monegaw Springs. There were fifty or a hundred persons there who will testify in any court that I and John were there. I will give you the names of some of them : Simeon C. Bruce,

John S. Wilson, James Van Allen, Rev. Mr. Smith and lady; Helvin Fickle and lady, of Greenton Valley, were attending the Springs at that time, and either of them will testify to the above, for John and I sat in front of Mr. Smith while he was preaching, and had the pleasure of his company for a few moments, together with his lady, and Mr. and Mrs. Fickle, after service. They live at Greenton Valley, Lafayette county, Missouri, and their evidence would be taken in the Court of Heaven. As there was no other robbery committed until January, I will come to that time. About the last of December, 1873, I arrived in Carroll parish, Louisiana. I stayed there until the 8th of February, 1874. I and brother stayed at Wm. Dickerson's, near Floyd. Dickerson was Master of a Masonic Lodge, and during the time the Shreveport stage and the Hot Springs stage was robbed; also the Gad's Hill robbery. Now, if the Governor or any one else wants to satisfy himself in regard to the above he can write to the Masonic Fraternity, Floyd, Carroll parish, Louisiana. I hope the leading journals will investigate the matter, and then, if they find I have misrepresented anything, they can show me up to the world as being guilty, but if they find it as I have stated they surely would have no objections to state the facts as they are.

You can appeal to the Governor in your own language, and if he will send men to investigate the above, and is not satisfied of my innocence, then he can offer the reward for Thos. Coleman Younger, and if he finds me to be innocent, he can make a statement to that effect. I write this hurriedly, and I suppose I have given outlines enough. I want you to take pains and write a long letter for me and sign my name in full.

THOS. COLEMAN YOUNGER.

In order to test the truth of the above letter, so far as the Shreveport stage robbery, the Hot Springs stage robbery, and the Gad's Hill train robbery were concerned, the author of this book wrote to Mr. William Dickerson, of Carroll parish, Louisiana, the gentlemen referred to in the letter. Mr. Dickerson, as we have learned, is a gentleman of standing and respectability in Carroll parish; he was, at the time referred to in Cole Younger's letter, Master of the Masonic Lodge at Floyd, and no hesitancy should be entertained by the reader in placing the utmost confidence in what he says. The following is his reply to our letter, in full, as it was written by Mr. Dickerson, which is also certified to, so far as its truth and correctness are concerned, by ten men of respectability and standing in that community. The letter is as follows:

FLOYD, LA., August 7th, 1875.

MR. A. C. APPLER, Osceola, Mo.:

DEAR SIR—Yours of July 10th was received a few days since. In reply to which I have to state that on the 5th day of December, A. D. 1873, the Younger Brothers arrived at my house, in Carroll parish, La., and remained there until the 8th day of February, A. D. 1874, during which time Cole Younger was engaged in writing the history of Quantrell and his own life. While at my house I asked Cole if he was a Mason, to which he replied in the negative.

Relative to the charges for this information, I will say that it is worth nothing unless it be a copy of the work you are now preparing to publish, which would be thankfully received. Yours truly, &c.,

WM. DICKERSON.

We, the undersigned citizens of Carroll parish, Louisiana, and neighbors of Mr. William Dickerson, know and believe the statement of his above written regarding the Younger Brothers, to be true and correct.

THE GENEVIEVE BANK ROBBERY.

I hereby certify that I attended Mr. Murphy, of St. Clair county, Missouri, during his sickness in November, 1872, and that on the day the St. Genevieve, Missouri, Bank was said to have been robbed, I saw at the house of Mr. Murphy, in the county of St. Clair, Thomas Coleman Younger, generally called Cole Younger, and that he could not possibly have had any hand in said bank robbery, as he was sitting up with and nursing Murphy during his sickness.

THE IOWA TRAIN ROBBERY.

We, whose names are hereto subscribed, certify that we saw Thomas Coleman Younger at Monegaw Springs, St. Clair county, Missouri, on Sunday, July 20th, 1873, the day previous to the Iowa Train Robbery, which occurred on Monday morning, July 21st, 1873, and that said Thomas Coleman Younger could not possibly have had any hand in said robbery.

COLE YOUNGER WITH QUANTRELL.

THE FLANNERY FIGHT.

Thomas Coleman Younger, commonly called Cole Younger, joined the forces of Quantrell, at that time comprising only eight men, about the first of January, 1862. They were then camped on the Little Blue, in Jackson county, Missouri. All of the men comprising this little band, were young men of standing and respectability in that community, and some of them were sons of the most wealthy and prominent citizens of the county. Very early in the spring Quantrell and his little band of nine men crossed over into

Kansas to see if they could not recover some of the fine blooded horses stolen from Henry W. Younger the year previous. After searching around a day or two without discovering the whereabouts of any of the stock, they returned to Missouri, stopping for the night at the house of a friend, Flannery, in Jackson county, Missouri. As it afterwards proved, they were followed by a Capt. Peabody, with one hundred men, who surrounded the house at which they were stopping. After tapping on the door to awake the inmates, Capt. Peabody demanded of Quantrell an unconditional surrender. Quantrell replied that he would give him an answer in ten minutes, which was allowed him. During the ten minutes time allowed him, Quantrell arranged his men in different parts of the house, the better to enable them to fire with effect, as also to be protected from the fire of the enemy. Cole Younger was placed in the loft, at an attic window, while the other men were stationed at the doors and windows. When all necessary arrangements had been made, Quantrell stepped to the door and told Peabody that he would not surrender, accompanying his words with a round from his double-barrel shotgun, which killed the First Lieutenant under Peabody. All of Quantrell's men followed, pouring a deadly fire into the ranks of the enemy. The Jayhawkers immediately returned the fire, and the fight was kept up for about two hours, when the ell of the house was discovered to be on fire. Cole Younger was then called down stairs and preparations made to charge the enemy and escape. After making a careful examination of the situation of affairs, Quantrell concluded it was not possible to escape. It was then concluded to keep up a steady fire on the enemy in front of the house, hoping to compel them to give way. This plan was tried for some time without the desired effect. By this time the fire had so far progressed that a portion of the roof of the main house was beginning to fall in. Quantrell then determined to try strategy, and, gathering his men about him, to give them instructions, found two men missing and one wounded. Cole Younger searched the house and found the two missing men under the bed, and told them to come out, as the house was on fire and they would be burned up alive if they did not try to escape with the rest. They did not come out and were burned to death. Quantrell then explained his plan to his men, which was to take pillows, place hats on them, and stick them out of the windows, hoping thereby to draw the fire of the enemy, and while their guns were empty make a charge on them and escape, firing as they rushed from the house. This strategic movement was carried out and succeeded very well, and as soon as the most of them were supposed to have emptied their guns, Quantrell threw open the door and ordered his men to follow him, rushing out of the house and emptying the contents of their guns among the enemy, which caused them to give way, while they rushed through their line. In their flight they met with an obstacle in the way of a picket fence, which caused them to scatter some. The Jayhawkers, knowing the obstruction that was in their way, closed in behind them. Cole Younger became entirely separated from the others, and after scaling the fence, was followed by some cavalry, who were stationed in the field. He made the best possible time across the field, and when the cavalry would approach within shooting range of him, he would halt and present his gun, as though about to fire, when they would throw themselves on the opposite side of their horses and halt. He would then take advantage of this and continue his flight, and when they would near him again, he would resort to the same strategy, with the same effect. This was repeated several times, until at length he reached the fence and brush, when he made good his escape, not however, until he had wounded one man and killed another of his pursuers. Quantrell and the rest of the men also made their escape. In the fight fifteen of the Jayhawkers were killed and a number wounded. All of Quantrell's men lost their horses.

Cole Younger rejoined Quantrell in a day or two. Their future operations were then discussed, and in view of the fact that they had been slipped up on, in the last engagement, retaliation in like manner was determined on. While thus planning and arranging for future operations, the Federals stationed at Harrisonville and Independence were not idle, well knowing that they had a wily foe to contend with, although few in number. Knowing that they had dismounted Quantrell and his men, and supposing most of them wounded, they at once concluded that the wounded would fall an easy prey to their untiring energy, and at once determined to scour the country thoroughly, and force the citizens to give them information of their whereabouts. Old men were imprisoned, young men murdered outright, and the women insulted and abused, with the view of gaining information of the whereabouts of Quantrell and his men. All this failed them.

In the mean time, Quantrell, learning these facts, succeeded in mounting his men and started on the war trail, having the assurance of the citizens that his movements would be kept secret. They were constantly on the alert, and on Friday morning, two weeks after the engagement at Flannery's, Quantrell received information through Union men, that the Federal Colonel stationed at Independence had learned that Cole Younger had stopped for a day or two at old man Blythe's, and had determined to send out a scouting party to Blythe's house, with full authority to force the old gentleman to reveal the whereabouts of Younger. Quantrell, knowing Blythe to be a particular friend of Younger's, asked Younger what they had better do. Younger replied: "They better not hurt that old man." After further consultation it was agreed that Blythe should be notified of the fact, and told to secrete himself that day, while Quantrell and his men would watch their movements, and, if possible, prevent them from reaching Blythe's house, on the Harrisonville and Independence road. As soon as possible Quantrell stationed his men at the Cut, which is about thirty feet deep, one hundred and fifty yards in length, and quite narrow at the bottom. But the Federals, by some means, were thrown off their direct course and did not come that way. After waiting there until late in the afternoon, Quantrell proposed to Younger to ride down the road towards Blythe's house, which was about three miles distant, and see if he could hear anything of them. After traveling out on the road about one mile he met an old negro man belonging to Mr. Moore, who seemed to be very much frightened. After being questioned he told Younger the Federals had been at Blythe's house, and failing to find the old gentleman at home, proceeded to reap vengeance upon his son, a lad of about twelve years of age.

KILLING OF YOUNG BLYTHE.

Young Blythe was taken to the barn and told that he must tell where Quantrell and his men were, or else they would kill him. The boy parlied with them a few moments, watched an opportunity, and then broke and run to the house, entering the door in the midst of a perfect shower of bullets fired at him from the barn. The boy then got an old pistol that was in the house and passed out at the back door, thinking to make his escape. While getting over the fence in the rear of the house he was observed and fired on, one shot striking him in the back, when he fell to the ground. The Jayhawkers then closed in on him to finish their work, when the boy, hearing them coming towards him, and knowing they would kill him, turned over on his side, resting on his elbow, and when they neared him fired two shots, killing one man and mortally wounding the second. They then made short work of him, riddling his body with bullets. The old negro was there on an errand and witnessed the whole proceeding. After the boy had been killed the negro became frightened and left, not knowing but what it would be his turn next. He took to the brush, and after traveling some distance got out on the main road, where he met Cole Younger and related to him the killing of young Blythe. Younger then asked the negro what direction they had taken, but he was unable to tell him, having left the place before they started.

THE FIGHT AT THE BLUE CUT.

Cole Younger then rode down the road a short distance, to an eminence, which commanded a good view of the road for some distance, when he saw the Federals coming. Riding back hastily until he overtook the negro, he told him to go down to the Blue Cut and tell Mr.

Heller, with whom he was acquainted, to look out, and he would report to him soon. Younger again rode back to the eminence, where he could plainly see the Federals coming up the road from the South, directly approaching the Blue Cut. He then put spurs to his horse and rode back to where Quantrell was, telling him what had happened, and that they were coming up the road. Quantrell then dismounted his men and arranged them on both sides of the Cut, on top, as well as at each end, with instructions to let the Federals pass in and then close up and fire on them. There were about thirty of the Jayhawkers. They marched on up the road and entered the Cut, not suspecting danger, until the rear men closed in on them and fired. As soon as the men stationed in the rear opened fire, those on top followed, pouring a deadly volley into their confused ranks, which was followed by those stationed in front, closing in and opening fire on them. Having been taken completely by surprise, they knew not which way to turn or what to do, while Quantrell's men continued to pour volley after volley into their ranks, which were by this time being thinned; men and horses were killed, wounded and dying, and the shrieks of the wounded were heard above the din of musketry, from one end of the Cut to the other. About twenty of the Jayhawkers were killed, but few escaping. None of Quantrell's men were hurt. As one of the Jayhawkers dashed out in front of the Cut, Cole Younger grabbed his horse by the bridle, and after checking his speed, drew his revolver and shot the rider dead.

THE INDIAN CREEK FIGHT.

Shortly after the preceeding occurrence; while Quantrell and his nine men were camped on Indian Creek, in Jackson county, Missouri, the Jayhawkers stationed at Independence took their whole force and surrounded the timber and brush in which Quantrell and his men were camped, twenty-five or thirty acres, having with them two pieces of artillery. After they had surrounded the camp the artillery was stationed in a lane running down to the timber, and they threw shells pretty lively for awhile, the cavalry having been stationed on the opposite side, in an open field, where it was supposed Quantrell's men would come out to make their escape. This occurred shortly before night. Quantrell, seeing the predicament in which he was placed, secreted his men in a ravine, which protected them from the artillery, and at the same time afforded them an opportunity to keep up a fire on the cavalry whenever they made their appearance in a certain direction, within range of their guns. The fight was kept up until dark, when the Federal officer threw a strong guard around the entire camp, to prevent the possibility of their escape. During the night, as was afterwards ascertained, a large number of the Federals were dismounted and drilled as infantry, preparatory to a charge upon the camp in the morning, thus hoping to capture or kill all of the Guerrillas. While all this was going on, on the one side, Quantrell was devising ways and means of escape. While Quantrell and Haller were thus planning, Haller suggested that Cole Younger had better be called in the council, as he knew every inch of the country, and was a perfect backwoodsman. When Younger was called, he gave a detailed account of the location, &c. There was a farm-house and barn inside of the Federal lines, and also quite a large lot of stock. Younger at length suggested that they stampede the stock, to draw the fire of the enemy, as well as create confusion in their ranks, and thus, while in confusion, make their escape. The stock was at length stampeded and driven through the Federal lines, many of them being killed and wounded. The stampede created much confusion in the Federal ranks, causing quite a gap to be opened, through which Quantrell and his men passed out. The Federals did not discover their mistake for some time, as the night was dark. Cole Younger led the way, and when near the pickets, they took advantage of a stone fence by crawling on their hands and knees, single file, making good their escape. After they had safely passed all danger, Quantrell, in talking over the matter, expressed dissatisfaction at the result or termination of it, and having, as he believed, a thorough knowledge of the position of the Federals, and knowing that but a small force was left with the artillery, in the rear, determined that he would, if possible, gain possession of it in the morning, by taking them by surprise. Younger was then consulted as to the best means of gaining a favorable position to observe the movements of the Federals in the morning, so as to be ready and in position to charge the artillery at the opportune moment. It was then agreed that the men should be fed and refreshed for the morning service, while Younger would go out and gain knowledge of the true position of the Federals. This he accomplished by stealthily crawling around until he came near to them. He soon found out that they had not materially changed their position. At times he was actually right among them. After fully satisfying himself of these facts, and also ascertaining that a large force had been dismounted, and their horses placed in charge of a small negro guard, he returned to Quantrell and detailed to him the information he had obtained.

Quantrell at once determined to charge the artillery in the morning, capture it, and then open fire on the infantry, at the same time putting in a few random shots among the guards with horses. At four o'clock in the morning Quantrell's forces were in line, with Cole Younger in front, as guide, with instructions to lead them to some practicable point of attack near the artillerymen. This was successfully done by leading them in a circuitous route to an old orchard, which was full of volunteer hemp, the better enabling them to gain a favorable position. Finally, they were stationed within forty yards of the artillery. One man was then placed where the movements of the cavalry and infantry could be observed in the morning. When daylight arrived Quantrell received information from the man on the lookout, that the infantry were preparing to make a charge through the brush, while the cavalry were posted on the opposite side (where it was supposed Quantrell and his men would come out in trying to make their escape.)

About this time a heavy force of cavalry was seen approaching from the East, who were supposed to be, by the Federals, Col. Up. Hays' Confederates, as they were expected daily about that time. Each party observed the other about the same time. The Federal cavalry at once passed around the timber to the infantry, with the view of consolidating their forces. The officer in command of the infantry, seeing the movement of the cavalry, then ordered his men to fall back to their horses, so they could quickly mount in case it was necessary. The Federals, in their surmises that the approaching cavalry was that of Col. Up. Hays' command, were mistaken, as it afterwards turned out to be Jennison and his band of Kansas red-legs. After this movement of the Federals, Quantrell became satisfied that they had abandoned their idea of capturing him and his men, and were looking out for their own safety. In the meanwhile Quantrell took in the situation at a glance, and sprang like a tiger upon the cavalrymen, engaging them in a hand to hand fight, killing all who did not immediately take to a cornfield near by. Having thus secured the two guns in a moment, George Todd, one of Quantrell's best men, and who, by the way, was an old artilleryman, took charge of the guns and at once opened a severe fire on the infantry, who were then coming up the lane to gain their horses, while an occasional shot was thrown in among the horses, effectually stampeding the guard. After the guard with the horses was stampeded, a most terrific fire was kept up on the infantry, who, by this time, were retreating in the direction of Little Santa Fe.

This little brush completely demoralized Jenison also, who thought the rebs were about in great numbers, and he also made a hasty retreat in the direction of Kansas, throwing away every description of plunder, which he had been gathering up as he passed through the country. Thus the reader will observe that two armies of Federals, with artillery, were frightened,—first, by one another; and secondly, by nine of Quantrell's men—their artillery captured, and they driven from the field. This is no fancy sketch, but a stubborn fact, and one which, when the facts in the case became known, created considerable talk and laughter throughout that section of the country. Quantrell then took the artillery and threw it into the Big Blue, and mounted his men on the best horses that were captured from the Federals.

A REIGN OF TERROR.

After this little affair became known the Federal authorities at Kansas City sent for Jennison and his band of Kansas Red Legs, and an indiscriminate slaughter was carried on throughout that whole country by Jennison and his men, assisted some by others, while the Federal forces stationed at Kansas City, Independence, &c., held the posts. Such was the conduct of the Federal forces throughout this section of the State, that nearly every man of nerve and pluck at once rallied to the support of Quantrell, until his little band of nine men soon increased to the number of sixty, which enabled him to do better and more effective service. Skirmishing was an almost everyday occurrence, and during that summer hundreds of the Jayhawkers were sent to other homes than that of Kansas.

QUANTRELL ORGANIZES A COMPANY.

Quantrell then proceeded to organize a company, in regular military order, he being elected Captain. Wm. Haller was elected First Lieutenant; Cole Younger Second Lieutenant, and George Todd, Third Lieutenant. Having thus effected a complete organization, Quantrell at once commenced to shadow the operations of the Federal forces, keeping spies continually in Kansas City and Independence. There was scarcely a man or woman in that whole community but what constituted himself and herself a committee of one to watch the operations of the Jayhawkers and give Quantrell information. Even some strong Union men acted as spies, so utterly disgusted were the citizens with the conduct of the Federals, who were carrying on an indiscriminate murder and robbery. Quantrell and his men committed none of these depredations, but on the contrary, endeavored by every possible means to prevent them being perpetrated. To this circumstance may be attributed the fact of Union men giving information to Quantrell. So complete and thorough was the co-operation of the citizens with Quantrell, that the slightest demonstration on the part of the Federal forces was duly noted and immediately reported to him. Not a scout could leave town or approach from Kansas, without his knowing the fact and operations set on foot to check the movement. Quantrell kept his men divided into four squads, the better and more effectually to execute his work. One squad was placed under the charge of Cole Younger, one under George Todd, one under Haller, and the other Quantrell had under his immediate control; the whole force concentrating whenever deemed necessary. Quantrell always carried with him an Opelousas or Texas steer's horn, which had a peculiar sound, and could be heard at a distance of about four miles. All of his men were acquainted with its peculiar sound, and whenever a certain blast from it was given, all hands rallied to the assistance of their commander. Another peculiar feature of the sounding of this horn was, that with it he was able to make his officers understand what he desired them to do, all having been drilled to certain signals. As before remarked, scarcely a day passed without some skirmishing, and in almost every instance the Jayhawkers suffered in loss of men.

TWO MEN KILLED AND ONE CAPTURED.

In June, 1862, while the Jayhawkers were watching a ford on the Little Blue, three of Quantrell's men rode into the river to water their horses, when they were fired upon from ambush, two being killed and the third wounded and captured. The wounded man was taken to Independence, where he was placed in jail and abused in the most shameful manner. On learning of his treatment, Quantrell determined to release him as soon as his wounds were sufficiently healed to enable him to travel. He then set all of his men on the alert to capture some of the Federals, to be held for exchange, and for the good treatment of the prisoner held at Independence. No opportunity presented itself for several weeks.

TWO SUCCESSFUL SORTIES.

At length Quantrell learned that the prisoner held at Independence was to be hung at the court house on a certain day. He at once determined on a plan to capture some of the Jayhawkers. Haller, with four men, was sent into Independence at night, to the house of his (Haller's) mother, to gain information in regard to the position of the Federal pickets. They all arrived safely, and there learned from an old servant that four of the pickets had been stationed at an old woolen mill south of town. Haller, knowing the ground to be very rough in that vicinity, concluded to make a personal reconnoissance of the position, in order to gain knowledge of their exact location. He then left the men at the house of his mother, and proceeded on foot to make the examination. Finding it practicable, he at once determined to kill or capture the pickets, but decided not to kill them if possible to capture them. Returning to the house, he there learned that a picket force was stationed on the opposite side of the town, and knowing that if he made an attack upon the pickets at the woolen mill, the Federal forces would be rapidly thrown in that direction, and thus prevent him making his escape with the prisoners; and knowing that Cole Younger was stationed at the old Younger farm, three miles south of town, he sent a runner to him with instructions to make a spirited demonstration on the river road, to enable Haller to capture the pickets at the woolen mill.

Younger at once mounted his men and proceeded to do as directed. After passing around the town he took steps to ascertain the exact position of the pickets on that road, and finding they were stationed near Hiram Young's factory, he cautiously approached the rear end of the building, dismounted his men, opened the door, and all led their horses through the building to the front door, which opened out into the street between the pickets and the main camp. The building was a large one-story frame, used for a wagon factory, without flooring. Younger then mounted his men and rode noiselessly down the street, when he saw at a glance that the pickets had not suspected his approach. Two of them were sitting on an old bridge, while the rest were sleeping near by. Quick as thought, Younger and his men dashed down the street on the pickets, yelling at the top of their voices, and firing as they neared them. The two pickets that were awake returned the fire, wounding one of Younger's men and killing one horse. One of them was captured but the other got away. Those who were asleep jumped up and ran away, when they were fired on, two being killed and four captured. Younger then took his prisoners and passed around the town, driving in the pickets on the Blue Hill road, and then made his way to Quantrell's camp.

As soon as Haller heard the firing of Younger's men he jumped his pickets, captured them without firing a gun, and straightway went to Quantrell's camp with his prisoners.

After Younger and Haller reported with their prisoners, Quantrell wrote a letter to the Federal officer at Independence, stating that if he killed the wounded prisoner he held, the prisoners in his hands would share a similar fate; but that if he released him, as also the old men he held, some 20, he, Quantrell, would release the prisoners he held on parole. The Federal officer finally acceded to the proposition and both sides released their prisoners. When Quantrell released his prisoners, there was among them an Irishman who refused to return with his companions, but insisted on joining the forces of Quantrell, at the same time stating that he had, for some time, been desirous of joining his company, and determined to do so at the first favorable opportunity, and now that an opportunity presented itself, he was going to carry out his intention, which he did.

YOUNGER SHOOTS HIS COUSIN.

One night Cole Younger went to the house of his grand-mother, Mrs. Fristo, where he stayed for supper, hitching his horse back of the house, in the brush. After eating supper and talking to the old lady for some time, Cole concluded he would return to camp. He bid the old lady good-bye, and walked out on the porch, which was elevated some four feet from the ground and open underneath. The moon was shining brightly at the time. Just as he was about to step off the porch he was surprised to meet his cousin, Capt. Charles Younger, of the State Militia. Both recognized each other and shook hands. After shaking hands Capt. Younger said: "You are my prisoner." Cole scanned him closely for a moment, and then, quick as lightning, grabbed his revolver, threw it into his face and fired, Capt. Younger dropping dead, as Cole supposed, when he, Cole, sprang from the porch and ran up through the yard, as he then discovered that the house was surrounded by soldiers. When near the fence and brush, where his horse was, Cole fell over a bee-gum and dislocated his knee; at this very instant a shower of lead passed over him, cutting the back of his coat into ribbons, but not drawing blood. Had he not fallen the very instant he did, he would have been instantly killed. With his knee badly injured, Cole crawled to the brush, got on his horse and made his escape.

THE FEDERAL MAJOR LINDEN.

There was a Major Linden, of the 7th Missouri Cavalry, Volunteers, stationed at Harrisonville, who did not approve of the course pursued by the Jayhawkers, as well as some of the Federal officers. His idea of conducting the war was to make friends of those who differed with him, and, instead of driving men into the Southern army by ill-treatment, he endeavored, by good treatment, to induce those who were in to forsake the cause in which they had enlisted. He would not allow any of his men to commit depredations or take anything without paying for it. The course he pursued made everybody respect him who was disposed to see the unhappy state of affairs that existed in the country brought to a speedy termination, while the Jayhawkers and all evil-disposed persons denounced his course. He denounced and punished Union men and Rebels alike, whenever they did wrong. In one sense it might be said he acted in concert with Quantrell. One day, while Neugent's Jayhawkers were prowling through the country they took as prisoner Richard DeJarnett, a highly respected citizen, taking him to Harrisonville and handing him over to Maj. Linden, preferring charges against him of stealing and various other depredations. Linden tried him and found that none of the charges preferred against him could be sustained, when he turned him loose. This made Neugent quite angry, and he threatened to do wonders. Linden paid but little attention to him for a while, until finally he gave him to understand that if he, Neugent, did not conduct himself properly, he would take him in hands and punish him as he deserved. Linden, being unwilling to carry on a warfare as practiced by most of the Federal officers, became disgusted and resigned in September, 1862.

CAPTURE OF MAIL, AMMUNITION, ETC.

A citizen of Harrisonville frequently carried the mail to Lexington, and one day Quantrell learned that this citizen had gone to Lexington to bring the mail, a lot of ammunition, some uniforms, etc., when he at once determined to capture the whole outfit, and requested Cole Younger to do up the job. Cole soon started on the errand and brought back the whole concern. There was quite a lot of ammunition, a Colonel and Lieutenant Colonel's uniform, the mail, etc. The prisoner was turned loose. None of Quantrell's officers would put on the uniforms, much less wear them, and the men would frequently put them on some one and get them to strut about the camp, giving orders, etc., which would create much merriment.

As soon as it became known to the Federal authorities that the mail, ammunition, etc., had been captured, scouting parties were sent out in every direction to recapture the lost property, but without avail. The only good accomplished was the loss of some of the Jayhawkers.

QUANTRELL MAKES BOLD STRIKES.

Quantrell, now having sixty-three men, all well armed, mounted and drilled for effective service, decided to make some bold strokes.

He concentrated his forces at Lee's Summit, in Jackson county, Missouri, keeping the main body of his men together, secreted, while Cole Younger was detailed to make violent demonstrations on the Federal camps at Harrisonville, Independence and Kansas City alternating between the different places. Younger and his squad of six men, were to draw the Federals out of town, to the place where Quantrell and his men were secreted, and by this means they would be able to do much execution. While thus engaged, Younger would frequently ride within shooting distance of the Federal pickets at Independence, fire upon them, and then retreat, hoping to induce them to follow him. But the Federals had learned what kind of men they had to deal with, and seldom followed any distance. Federal communication between Harrisonville and Independence was entirely cut off, except an occasional mail that was sent out under a strong guard.

ANOTHER FIGHT AT THE BLUE CUT.

One day Quantrell learned that the mail would pass, by the way of Pleasant Hill, from Harrisonville to Independence, under a strong guard of Neugent's men. He at once determined to give them a round. Younger was detailed to attend to them, whose force of six men, by this time, had increased considerably, by the addition of new recruits. He at once placed spies all along the road, to watch the movements of the Jayhawkers. At length he received information that they were taking the Blue Cut road, He at once proceeded to arrange his men in a similar manner as did Quantrell on a previous occasion, at this same place, heretofore mentioned. After arranging his men another runner arrived with the intelligence that the party was commanded by Capt. Long, an old acquaintance of Younger. He was also told that Isaac Shoat, a deserter from Quantrell, and a man by the name of Coon, a notorious house-burner, were in the party. Younger then went to every one of his men, gave them a minute description of Capt. Long, and told them by no means to shoot at him.

It was natural to suppose that the Federals would be on their guard when passing through the Cut, after being previously trapped there, but such was not the case. It was apparent that the men had been drinking freely of ardent spirits, and seemed not to think or care of consequences. As they approached the Cut one of them was heard to remark: "What if that damn Quantrell was here again?" His companion replied: "Oh, I guess he has gone South—there is only a small squad here under Cole Younger, now." By this time they were about midway of the Cut, Capt. Long riding behind, when Cole Younger sprang upon a rock commanding the position, and, in a loud voice, demanded their surrender. His summons to surrender was answered by a volley of musketry, when a murderous fire was opened upon them by the Guerrillas from behind rocks, trees and logs. The Jayhawkers kept up quite a spirited resistance for awhile, Capt. Long shouting to his men to stand their ground, until they were mowed down to such an extent that it was found necessary for them to retreat, if any of them expected to escape. Just at this moment Younger's men closed in at the head and foot of the cut, and as Younger entered the road Capt. Long and the deserter, Shoat, dashed by. Younger shot Capt. Long's horse from under him, the horse falling upon him and pinioning him to the ground; when Younger fired at Shoat, who, by this time, was fifty yards off, shooting him as he supposed, in the back. Younger then sprang to Capt. Long's assistance, rolling the horse off of him, and raising him up, asked him if he was hurt. "No, nothing more than a bruised leg." Younger then told him to sit down, and he would go down the cut and see what had become of the other boys. When he reached the top of the hill, where he could see down into the cut, his eyes beheld a confused mass of men and horses, horses lying upon riders and riders lying upon horses, dead, wounded and dying, while those of the Federals who had escaped unhurt, surrendered unconditionally. Younger ordered the prisoners to march up the hill to where Capt. Long was sitting, and after placing them under guard, he turned to Capt. Long, saying, "Come, Al., let us go down and see who is hurt." While looking around through the confused mass of men and horses, Younger discovered the notorious Coon, wounded in the back part of the thigh. Coon immediately recognized Younger, and begged him to spare his life. Younger replied, "You cowardly dog, you deserve to die right here, but you need not be alarmed, it is not my style to hurt a man when he is down." Younger then called for assistance, and the wounded were carried to a creek, near by, given water, their wounds dressed, etc. After all had been cared for as well as could be, Younger turned to Capt. Long and said: "I guess the wounded can now get along without my assistance, as I must be going." Long then asked: "What are you going to do with me?" Younger replied: "Haven't we always been friends?" "Yes," replied Long. "I never go back on a friend," replied Younger, "and hope we will always have reason to look upon each other as friends. Now, Al., take care of your wounded, and do the best you can. I will leave you here." As Younger turned to go away he remarked, "the very man I wanted, that deserter, Shoat, has made his escape." Younger then rode back to where the prisoners were under guard, and, after making them a speech, advising them to go home and stay there, released them. Forming his men into line, he turned to ride away, when he got a glimpse of somebody coming towards him on horseback, and, thinking him to be a runner with some valuable information, waited until he arrived. The rider, after being interrogated, informed Younger that he was going for a doctor. Younger asked, "Who for?" He replied, "There is a man up at the house of Dr. Nolan's badly wounded, who fell off of his horse when directly opposite the house." Younger then asked his name, but the man did not recollect it. Some one of the men asked if it was Shoat, when he replied, "Yes, that's it it." Some of the boys proposed that they go up there and finish him, when Younger replied there was no use in that, it was not his style of doing business. The Doctor was procured, but only arrived there to find that his wound was mortal and that he was then dying. Before breathing his last he told the Doctor that he tried to make his escape, as when he saw Younger he knew he would be killed, and felt confident Younger had shot him. Younger then told his men to scatter and meet him at Quantrell's camp.

This engagement was immortalized by a little ditty, composed by a friend of Younger's, sung to the tune and chorus of Dixie, one verse of which is as follows:

“As we were crossing Little Blue,
We met Younger and his crew;
They killed Cap's horse and robbed the mail,
And shot our Coon through the tail.”

THE WALNUT CREEK FIGHT.

In July, 1862, immediately following the second engagement of the Little Blue, the Federals, with forces numbering about 2,000 men, were continually scouting around through the Sny and Blue Hills, hunting Quantrell and his little band. Skirmishing was an every day occurrence. At length Quantrell, seeing that their whole force was kept in Jackson county, determined to give them the dodge and strike Harrisonville, Cass county, in their rear. Mounting his men, he slipped out of the Sny Hills under cover of night, and made his way direct for Harrisonville, about twenty miles distant. He reached within a mile of Harrisonville just as day broke in the morning, when, looking back on the road, he discovered that he was closely pursued by a large force of Federals. He then changed his plan of operations and took the road for Austin, hoping to fall in upon a Federal camp. When he reached Austin he found the place evacuated, the camp fire still burning. He then dismounted, fed the horses, the men ate their breakfast, and when about to start the Federals were again discovered coming up the road some six hundred strong. Quantrell turned to Haller and said, "All the Feds. in the country are on our trail, and this is a strange country to me. It would be best for us to make our way back to the Blue Hills, where, if they press us too hard, we can scatter and throw them off our trail, and then concentrate our forces and attack them in their rear." Haller replied, "But who knows the country; we cannot go back direct, but must take a circuitous route." Quantrell then replied, "I will see Younger; he will be more likely to know the country than any one else." Younger was then asked if he could lead them back to the Blue Hills, and he replied that he could, as he was perfectly familiar with the country. Younger then took the lead, going out the Dayton road, and when he reached Dayton there learned that the Rider Boys, of bush-wacking notoriety, were at home. He then passed on to Mrs. Rider's house, where he met John Rider, who had twelve men under his command. Younger then related to Rider the situation of things, telling him they had use for every man they could possibly raise. Rider asked Quantrell how he was going to get out of that scrape, as the Federals could then be seen approaching. Quantrell replied, "I am leaving the matter with my White Haired Boy," a name he often gave Cole Younger. "Well," replied Rider, "he knows every hog path, and can carry you through safe." Younger then asked Rider if he would join them, telling him he had heard of some of his exploits. Rider answered in the affirmative, saying, "I am always in for a little fun." The forces were then swelled to seventy-five men.

They then took the road to Walnut Creek, in Johnson county, the Federals pressing them closely. After reaching Walnut Creek, they took the brush and the Federals lost their trail. After travelling through the brush some distance they entered the main road, north, and travelled direct to the Sny Hills. After marching some six miles on the road, they stopped to feed and get dinner, having dismounted in an old orchard, back of the house. While busy feeding their horses and grooming, the pickets came in and reported that the Federals were coming in on their trail, from the South, 200 strong.

The Federals approached within about half a mile of the house, when they observed that something was wrong there, and at once halted and formed in line of battle. Finally they concluded to send out an advance of twelve men, to ascertain definitely there were any Guerrillas about the premises. Quantrell, in the mean time, had fallen back and taken a position so that he could make an effectual resistance. He fell back to a small tract of timber, with a steep bluff on each side, where he felled trees, wrapped grape vines from tree to tree, and thus made his place of defence wholly unapproachable by cavalry, leaving but a small opening for Younger and his men to pass in, when compelled to retreat.

men, with instructions to do the best he could, and gradually retreat to where Quantrell and his main force was stationed. Finally, the Federal advance of twelve men started in the direction of the house, and when Younger saw that they were advancing, resorted to strategy, by getting the lady of the house to take their blankets and hang them over the fence, as though she had been washing, while Younger and his men crawled up behind the fence unobserved, and prepared for their approach, as soon as they came within range. The plan hit upon proved a complete success, and when the Federal advance rode up within close range, Younger and his men rose up from behind the fence and poured a deadly fire into them, killing all but one man. This was done in plain view of the Federal line, and they, perceiving the wholesale slaughter of their men, at once commenced making preparations for a retreat. Just as they were about to retrace their steps, they were reinforced by 200 men from Butler. As soon as the reinforcements arrived they resolved to avenge the death of their companions, and made a charge upon the house. Younger then slowly retreated in the direction of Quantrell's barricade, occasionally sending back a volley at his pursuers. Quantrell met him in the edge of the timber and showed him the way to enter, and as soon as he entered the fortifications the entrance was closed by felling trees, which had previously been prepared, so that a few strokes of the axe would bring them down. Quantrell had all of his men dismounted, their horses secured back in the ravine, out of the way of the bullets, and the men ready to open fire as soon as the enemy approached within range of their double-barrel shot-guns. Scarcely had Younger and his men entered the enclosure and dismounted, ere the Federals made a charge upon the works. The first charge only resulted in heavy loss to their cavalry, and they soon retreated a short distance. Quantrell always carried with him a wagon-load of Sharp's rifles to be used for long range, and these deadly weapons were now brought into requisition, and soon caused the Federals to retreat still further back.

Four separate and distinct charges were made by the Federals, each time resulting as the first. They were then reinforced by about 200 more men, and the fifth and sixth charges were made, resulting as before. Quantrell then concluded, although the odds were largely against him, to mount his men and charge the enemy upon the open field. After he had opened a path sufficient to allow of an exit from his work, mounted his men and got outside of the barricade, he observed that the Federals were again being largely reinforced, when he determined to abandon the charge. The Federals, observing Quantrell's movement, again made a charge, this time endeavoring to force an entrance where Quantrell and his men had entered, but they were met with such a deadly fire that they were compelled to retreat.

It was now near night, and Quantrell commenced felling trees and showing signs of strengthening his position, which led the enemy to believe that he meant to stay there. This seemed to satisfy them, and they were left to plan their operations for the next morning, while Quantrell and his men slipped out down the ravine.

During the last charge on his works, while Quantrell had his men mounted, his horse was shot from under him, and he received a shot in the right knee. Several other horses belonging to the men of his command were killed. Quantrell rode behind Younger, while the other men who were dismounted rode behind their comrades. They finally made their way to the Sny Hills, where they divided up into small squads and thus effectually eluded their pursuers.

TRIAL OF AN ENFIELD RIFLE.

Upon one occasion Quantrell's band encountered a party of Jayhawkers numbering thirty or more. A dozen of the Jayhawkers were killed and fifteen captured. They were taken to camp and the question of their fate soon settled. After supper, and while the shades of evening were approaching, Cole Younger got out an Enfield rifle captured that day. It was the first he had ever seen, and its merits and demerits were discussed by the men. Opinions differed as to its superior qualities. One of the men remarked that he heard it would kill at the distance of a mile. Younger replied, "if that is so, the force of the discharge must be terrific." Another banteringly remarked, if the new gun would kill at a mile distant, a ball, at a short range, would go through ten men. Younger raised up from the saddle upon which he had been sitting and remarked, that is easy to demonstrate. When the prisoners heard this remark they felt sure their time had come. The fifteen prisoners were then placed in a line, one behind the other, and Cole Younger took the gun, played with the lock a moment, to "get the hang of it," and then measured off fifteen paces in front of the line formed, wheeled about, looked calmly and soberly into the faces of the doomed men, and then fired. The first, second and third man dropped lifeless, without a groan. Muttering a contemptuous condemnation of the new rifle, Younger, without moving from his tracks, continued his experiments. Seven times the rifle was discharged, each time the Guerrillas commenting carelessly upon the merits of the Enfield, and fifteen of the Jayhawkers lay in an inanimate heap upon the grass.

A SHARP LITTLE FIGHT.

In the summer of 1862, Cole Younger and six of his companions in arms, watched a house of bad repute in Jackson county, where the Federal soldiers were in the habit of visiting, to catch some of the red legs and Jayhawkers, who, he learned, were there almost nightly. One evening about dusk he and his party made a charge upon the house. Four of his men, however, failed to charge with him. There were six men in the house at the time, and three of them immediately retreated out of the back doors and windows. The other three stood their ground and made a desperate fight, one shot of the first round killing a comrade of Cole Younger. Cole Younger fired two shots in rapid succession, both of which told with deadly effect. As Cole was about to dismount and rush into the house, the third man fired at him from the upper door with a double-barrel shot gun, loaded with buckshot, some of the shot entering his body under the right shoulder. He carries some of the lead to this day. He then fell from his horse, but immediately after rose up and rushed into the house, where he found the third man about to escape out of the back door, when he fired at him and brought him down. As soon as the fighting commenced the women made their escape from the house. Cole then sank to the floor from the loss of blood. As soon as he recovered he called his comrades to come to his assistance, which they did, and helped him on his horse. The party then rode fifty miles before Cole stopped to have his wounds dressed, and receive medical treatment.

A BRUSH WITH JAYHAWKERS.

In June, 1862, while with Quantrell in Cass county, Missouri, Cole Younger and a few men stopped at the house of a friend to get dinner, near Harrisonville, a sentinel being stationed near the house while the rest dined. Scarcely had they commenced to eat, before the guard gave the alarm that a squad of Federals was approaching the house, by the lane. This lane was two miles in length, running to the town of Harrisonville. Fifteen of Quantrell's men were at the other end of the lane, a few hundred yards distant, where another lane crosses, and in the rear of the field was brush. All along this lane lay grain-fields, which the sunny days of June had turned into waving gold. Nature seemed to smile all over these beautiful rolling farms, and say to the hungry soldier, "in a few weeks I will feed you." But alas, all was doomed to be destroyed before nature had fulfilled the promise.

Cole Younger, who was acting Captain of the scout, ordered his men to mount their horses and make for the timber, at the mouth of the lane. At the head of this lane was another lane leading off to the South. The main road leading to town came in from the West, or Kansas border. Here Cole and fifteen men met sixty of the Kansas Jayhawkers, in the sumac, at the head of the lanes, when Younger cried out, "Boys, charge them upon every hand," when the two commands came together with unsheathed sabres, drawn revolvers and whistling bullets. The contest lasted for about half an hour, and was hotly contested. It was a dashing fight upon horseback, in which many a saddle was emptied on the part of the Jayhawkers, as well as upon the Rebel side.

There were men with the Jayhawkers whom Cole and his men recognized as those whom they had long wanted to meet in deadly conflict, and now an opportunity offered itself. Although the force of the enemy was four times as large as Younger's, he and his men believed they would be able to send to their final resting place many of the Jayhawkers, where they would no longer be murdering and plundering. After the fight raged a few moments the men became scattered, and each and every one looked out for himself. At last Cole caught the eye of one whom he longed to meet, and the sight of him nerved him up to the very highest pitch, and he determined to kill him or die in the attempt. He knew this fellow's hands were dyed in the blood of his murdered father, and he made a dash at him, firing as he went. The fellow wheeled his horse and dashed over the fence, partly knocking it down, and then struck across the field, Younger following him. Cole's horse proved the fleetest, and the Jayhawker was soon overtaken and fell lifeless from his saddle. Younger then returned to the fight in the edge of the brush, and getting up with the boys yelled out:

“Boys, I got my main man! Give tne damn thieving cut-throats death on every hand!” Younger and his men by this time had got into the edge of the oak timber. Younger, while endeavoring to get another of his main enemies, run his horse over a post-oak brush, with a very large and thick crown, in which he fell, throwing Younger and got away from him. He then rose up and crept after his man on foot. The fellow’s horse had become entangled in some grape vines, and the rider was endeavoring to extricate him when Younger shot him dead. Mounting the Jayhawker’s horse, Cole returned to the fight. A good many of the Jayhawkers had fled from the field. The remainder and Younger’s men were hard at it, though some were killed and others wounded. At the close of the fight Al. Shepard’s horse, one of Cole’s men, was seen to fall. At this moment Younger looked up the lane and saw Jennison’s command approaching, when he ordered his men to follow him. They then charged a small squad of Jayhawkers in the mouth of the lane, who broke over the fence and fled through the field, when he passed on. About half way down the lane, south, in a sumac grove, in a hollow, they came upon a small squad of Jennison’s men, who seemed to be watering their horses. The meeting was unexpected on both sides, though Younger had his eye to business, and at once poured a shower of bullets into them, when they broke back up the lane, Younger and his men following and firing upon them. Upon coming to a lane at the end of the one they were in, they took east, while Younger and his men turned to the right. In the fight Younger lost three men killed and five wounded, the wounded recovering in a short time. The Federal loss was eleven killed and seventeen wounded. It was now about nightfall, and Younger returned to Quantrell's camp.

Jennison and his men camped at the farm house where Younger and his men were eating dinner when the Jayhawkers came upon them. The treatment the family received at the hands of the Jayhawkers was terrible in the extreme. They pastured down the golden grain, burned the fencing, destroyed the family provisions, burned the dwelling house, and took all the stock of value on the premises. Al. Shepard was supposed to be killed, for the last Cole saw of him, he and his horse were on the ground in the brush. After Younger and his men arrived at Quantrell's camp, and were relating the fearful little fight they had that day with the Kansas Jayhawkers. and had partaken of some refreshments, and were quietly smoking their corn-cob pipes, regretting the loss of their brave companions, Cole remarked: "Poor Al., how bravely he fought, but after all, poor fellow, he had to be cut down. His loss as a soldier is irreparable." While thus talking over the past, and viewing the future as best they could, one of the camp guards cried out: "Halt there, and give the countersign!" "I havn't got it," replied the approaching man upon horseback in the thicket. Cole Younger heard the voice, knew it, and jumped up from where he was sitting, smoking his pipe, and said: "There is no hell if that ain't Al. Shepard." Sure enough, it was him, mounted on a spirited charger. He reported that at the close of the fight his horse became entangled in the brush and fell, at the same time he was struck by a straggling ball. Seeing his friends had left and night was approaching, he concealed himself in the brush until dark, and then captured another horse from the enemy. As they had killed his, he thought they were entitled to furnish him another. He kept concealed until about eight o'clock, when he could hear the Jayhawkers at the farm house turning their horses out to graze upon the wheat. Some unsaddled their horses, while others were turned loose with the saddles upon them, and the bridles taken off and fastened to the horn of the saddle. The horses were scattered through the field, and discovering one good one, as he thought, some distance from the rest, he succeeded in coaxing him to be quiet until he secured him, and then took the bridle from the saddle and put it on, when he mounted and made his way to camp.

SURROUNDED IN A DESERTED BUILDING.

During the summer of 1862, while they were out on a scout, Quantrell and fifteen of his men took shelter in an old vacated house, in Jackson county, Missouri. About forty Kansas Jayhawkers got on their trail some time previous, and overhauled them shortly after entering the house. Quantrell had built a fire and was drying his blankets. Their horses were hitched about the house. Some of the men were yet holding their horses. Several were in the house with Quantrell, and one was dancing a jig, when all at once the cry came from every side of the house, "Surrender, you damn thieves." Quantrell said to his men, boys, the Red Legs have got us completely surrounded. "God damn you, come out and surrender, or we will kill every one of you," was again sounded in their ears, uttered by the leader of the Jayhawkers. Quantrell asked for three minutes time to consult with his men, which was granted. During the three minutes time allowed them, Quantrell's men recapped their guns and pistols, folded up their blankets, etc., and before the time given them had expired they were ready to scatter death and destruction among the Jayhawkers. Quantrell said to his men, "Boys, we must charge through them, and as soon as we get safe in the saddle open fire upon them," Cole Younger said, "Captain, if you have no objections, I will lead the charge." "All right," replied Capt. Quantrell. Younger rushed from the house, mounted his horse, and turned the head of his animal towards the head of the Red Leg column, with a dragoon pistol in each hand, followed by the men. He then clapped spurs to his horse and made a dash for the head of the Red Leg column. By this time the pistols of Younger and the men were being emptied in the ranks of the supposed victorious Jayhawkers, who, three minutes before, had been consulting in their own minds how they would put Quantrell and his men to death. But a few moments time upon the battle-field, often changes the fortunes of the day. The striking of the head of their column turned it to the right, when Younger charged right through, followed by his men. Much damage was inflicted upon the ranks of the enemy, while none of Quantrell's men were killed. Younger killed two men himself. Many of the enemy were killed and wounded. Three of Quantrell's men were slightly wounded. The charge was a complete success and Quantrell and his men made good their escape. The fight lasted but a moment, but while it was going on was extremely lively.

YOUNGER ESCAPES, LOSING HIS HORSE, COAT, ETC.

In the month of January, 1863, in Jackson county, Missouri, Cole Younger stopped at the house of a friend to stay for the night, the weather being quite cold, and four inches of snow on the ground. He had been in the woods all day, while the snow was falling. At night it ceased snowing and the weather became very cold. After dark he rode close to a cornfield, tied his horse and went into the field to procure some corn for the animal. The field belonged to a friend of the Confederate cause, and he felt no compunctions of conscience in taking a small amount of corn. The old gentleman was yet at home, as he was, at that time, like a great many others, who sympathized with the Southern cause. He had been forced to take the iron-clad oath, or one similar to the one known by that name, and by complying with its provisions the Federals promised him protection. The oath was frequently administered in order to keep them under subjection, yet, nevertheless, the cut-throat militia would come upon them with the plea that they had been feeding bushwhackers and shoot them down like wolves. This is the kind of civil war that was carried on in Missouri, by the militia bands, which were made up, as a rule, of the very worst class of men in the State.

But, to come directly to the point, this friend of Youngers was feeding his cattle upon the side of the field where Younger had fed his horse, and thus it will be perceived that any morning the stock would blot out all traces of any one having been there to feed his horse. After feeding, Younger would go into the stock trail, which led up to the barn, and went into the house to stay over night, as it was very cold, and he concluded the Federals would not be apt to move around much that night. Younger was sitting by the fire and had pulled off his coat and boots, preparatory to going to bed. It was then about nine o'clock. The dogs had kept up a barking for some time, and the gentleman of the house had gone to the door several times, but could not hear anything but the stock tramping around, apparently hunting shelter from the cold wind. It was not snowing, but the clouds were thick and heavy. Not a star was to be seen. While Younger was thus sitting by the fire, all the family having gone to bed, except the gentleman of the house, he and his friend happened to hear the latch of the gate open. Instantly Cole sprang up and made for the back door. He had no time to get his boots or coat. He opened the door and went into the back yard. As he did so the landlord made a terrible ado with a dog, apparently in the back room, where the militia supposed, hearing the noise, the man was trying to get out to enable Younger to go to bed. But really he was only trying to secrete Younger's coat and boots from the gaze of the soldiers when they entered the house. The militia came to the door with cocked guns and pistols in their hands, and when the door was opened they covered the gentleman of the house, saying: "Where is that damned Cole Younger?" "I have not seen him," was the reply, "for months, though I heard my wife say he was here this morning. He stopped here and made my wife get him something to eat, or, rather he got it himself, by going to the safe and helping himself to as much as he wanted," replied the gentleman of the house, "and I was going up in the morning to report the fact, and would have been up this afternoon but I had no feed out of the field for my hogs, and have been shucking corn all day. Under the circumstances I thought it would make no difference." They replied, "Oh, no," and uncovered him with their pistols and guns, "but we must search your house." "All right," replied the gentleman. The leader of the squad remarked: "I guess we won't find anything in the shape of Younger, for you have told us a very straight and reasonable tale." Younger's coat and boots had been thrown in an old box and a lot of carpet rags thrown over them, thus effectually hiding them from view. The house was thoroughly searched, but no traces of Younger were to be found. The leader said, "We thought we had him, sure, as we found his horse tied to the back of your field to-night, and got him." "I do wonder!" replied the host: "Yes we did," replied the leader of the squad: "he was seen by one of our friends, near dark, in the woods, half a mile north of your field, and this fact was reported. When seen by the good Union man, he and his horse were under a clump of brush, Cole Younger having his back towards him." "Might it not have been some one else?" asked the gentleman. "Oh, no," replied the leader, "this man knows Cole Younger too well to be mistaken. At the time he saw him he seemed to be very cold, and was stamping his feet upon the ground. We went to the place and struck his horse's track and followed it to where he tied and fed, and supposed he had come to your house or barn to sleep." "Well, he may be in the barn now," replied the gentleman. "No, he is not," replied the leader, "we have been all over the hay and oats in the barn loft, he is not there." "Oh, well," replied the farmer, "he may be in a shock of fodder in the field." "Well," replied the leader, "if he is he will have to stay there to-night, but we will give him a round in the morning. It is too cold to-night to hunt any further." The farmer remarked that "he seemed to be nearly starved that morning, as his wife told him that he ate very greedily." "We will give him bullets to eat in the morning," replied the leader, and off they went.

Cole Younger, after passing out the back door, went on through the garden, and got on top of a plank fence, on which he walked the whole length, about half a mile, to a county road, on which there was always considerable travel, it being a neighborhood road. Younger jumped from the fence and landed in the middle of the road, which, to his great delight, was pretty well tramped up by people and stock passing after the snow had ceased falling. He knew of a friend on this road, two miles off, and walked there as rapidly as possible. He reached the house about twelve o'clock that night and knocked at the door, when he was answered, "Who is there?" Cole replied, "A friend." The man at once recognized Younger's voice and got up and opened the door. Younger then told his friend what had happened to him. His friend replied, "I see you are badly off for a coat and a pair of boots, and must be near frozen." "Oh, no," replied Younger, "I can stand a great deal; I am used to roughing it." "Where is your horse," inquired his friend. "I tied him at the back of Mr. —'s field and fed him after night, and I guess they have got him; at least I shall not go back to look for him. I want you to furnish me a coat, boots and horse." "I can furnish you a coat and let you have my Sunday boots," replied his friend, "but the horse I cannot, as the Federals will find it out." "Oh," said Younger, "that can easily be arranged so as to screen you from harm. Just in the morning and report that your horse was stolen last night, with saddle and bridle, and they will quickly accuse me of it." "That will do," said the friend, and straightway he went to the stable, put the saddle and bridle on the horse, then returned to the house, telling Younger that the horse was in the stable, all ready. Cole then put on the coat and boots and was soon off, and by sunrise was in Lafayette county, twenty-five miles distant.

SUCCESSFULLY TRAPPED.

In July, 1873, while Cole Younger and eighteen men were in a creek bottom, in Jackson county, Missouri, Younger discovered on the prairie, about one mile distant, a company of the Missouri Militia making for a farm house, as was supposed. Younger and his men kept their eyes upon them until they arrived at the house and began to dismount. They were about thirty in number. Cole eagerly watched them, to ascertain, if possible, their movements. At length he said, "Boys, by properly managing it, I believe we can get a few of them." "Well," replied one of the men, "how shall we go about doing it?" "My plan is this," said Younger, "We will drop down in the heavy timber, in the creek bottom, along the road, and arrange ourselves in the following manner: Divide the men into two squads upon each side of the road, opposite one another. One squad to drop back in the brush ten or fifteen paces; the other half to pass on down the road sixty or one hundred yards in advance of the first party, secreted and situated similarly. Then send two men up the main road which leads by the house, and as those two men near the house the militia will discover them and put in full charge after them, and when those two men see them coming to fire on them and wheel and take back down the road, and they will, I believe, at once come to the conclusion that they are deserters, aiming to make their way home, and will exert themselves to the utmost to overtake and arrest them; the two men sent out to retreat back to where we are stationed, passing on through, and when those stationed furthest up the road find that they have all passed by, to fire on them from a kneeling position, thus allowing the bullets from each side to pass over our heads and horses; and as soon as the rear men commence firing, those in front to follow in like manner." Every man present signified his acceptance of the proposed plan, and at once two volunteers rode out, signifying their willingness to act as decoys to draw the militia into the trap, planned by Cole Younger's cultivated soldierly thought.

Up the road went the two decoys, mounted upon two very beautiful and fleet chargers, who were so full of spirit that they kept champing on their bits, and in a few moments two shots were heard up the road, not far from the farmhouse where the militia were seen to stop. In a few moments the secreted and awaiting Rebels heard and saw their two cavalymen coming down the road, with revolvers in hand and firing in the rear of them. On they came and passed through the trap, followed by the militia, and as soon as the last one had passed in, the rear men opened fire on them, which was immediately followed by those in front. Nine dead and wounded men lay in the road in a few moments. Four chanced to escape out of the trap. One of those who were killed was well known to Younger. He was a good man, but had been persuaded to join the militia. Younger regretted his death, but it was now too late. When Younger looked upon his lifeless body he almost shed tears. He was a warm personal friend of Cole Younger. Several of the horses belonging to the militia were killed and wounded. Not a single one of Younger's men was either killed or wounded.

THE INDEPENDENCE FIGHT.

On the first of August, 1862, Quantrell sent a dispatch to Cole Younger to meet him eight miles east of Independence. At this time Younger was camped near the farm of Mr. Thomas Talley, on Cedar Creek, in Jackson county, having about forty men under his command. After reading the dispatch he ordered his men to mount their horses. It was then about five o'clock in the evening. He at once proceeded to carry out orders, and rode off at a rapid rate, making a circuit of about twenty miles in order to get around the Federal post, and reached his destination in an almost incredible short space of time. They were then eight miles east of Independence, which they designed attacking at daylight. The Federal force at Independence numbered about six hundred men, under the command of Col. Buel. Quantrell took the main road for Independence, placing Cole Younger in the advance. When near the town a halt was made for a short time, after which, according to previous arrangements, Cole Younger led the charge. He charged through the town, directly under the fire of the guard, who were stationed at the bank. At the first round Kit Childs, one of his men, was killed, Col. Hughes, a Confederate Colonel, who chanced to be with them, was also killed shortly afterwards.

Younger led his advancing party on through the town to the main Federal camp, stationed about one mile west of Independence, where he made a bold and daring charge upon them, driving them, some five hundred strong, into the woods and behind a stone fence, near by. Younger then dismounted his men; a general engagement was commenced; advantage was taken of trees, stumps, &c., and a lively fire was kept up on the enemy. In the meantime, Quantrell was engaging those in the vicinity of the bank. Younger kept up a lively fire until about 11 o'clock, when he made a charge upon them and gained possession of the stone fence, which enabled him to keep up a continuous fire upon their then exposed ranks, which continued but a short time until the Federals made an unconditional surrender. He then ordered them to stack their arms, and, after placing a small guard over them, took his main force and rejoined Quantrell at the court-house, which was opposite the bank.

Younger then took his men and arranged them in the rear of the bank, so as to effectually prevent the Federals from firing upon them, while he and another man procured a lot of hay or straw from a barn near by and proceeded to fire the bank at a door in the rear of the building. After the bank was discovered to be on fire the Federals attempted to put it out, but a few well directed shots caused them to hastily retreat. At length the building got well under way of the flames, when Col. Buel and his men, about one hundred, surrendered unconditionally. During this whole engagement the loss of Quantrell's men footed up but nine, while those of the Federals amounted to 83. All the prisoners were then brought together and placed in line, after which they were paroled. After this Quantrell and his men proceeded to the stables where the Federal horses were, intending to select the best, and while looking at and examining them, an Irishman, a paroled prisoner, who was sitting on the fence, said to Cole Younger, "Be jabers, and I believe you're the same man that hollored so much." Younger replied, I yelled out several times. "Faith and I likes your looks better than any of them other fellows, and if you will come with me I will give you Spile Driver, the best horse on top of ground; he will carry you any place." Younger at once agreed to go and see the horse, and found him to be an excellent one, and at once appropriated him to his own use. He kept him the remainder of the war, although he was not kept in active service all the time. Quantrell withdrew his men from town and went into camp at old Mr. Walker's, some eight miles southwest of Independence, from which place he sent Cole Younger to meet Gen. Cockrell, who had dispatched Quantrell that he was coming in from the South, to recruit.

THE BATTLE OF LONE JACK.

On the 15th day of August, 1862, the day after the Independence fight, Cole Younger, with about forty men, started to meet Cockrell, going as far as the Sny Hills, the first day, where he stopped for the night. The next morning he heard firing in the direction of Lone Jack, about nine miles distant, and at once went to the scene of battle, getting there at the time the battle raged the hottest, about two hours after it commenced. After arriving at the scene of deadly conflict, and taking a survey of the field to ascertain the position of the Confederate forces, he proceeded to report to Gen. Cockrell, who informed him that he needed cavalry, as all his horses were jaded. Cole Younger then told Cockrell that he had forty men, all well mounted and armed, and then proceeded to carry out the instructions of Cockrell. He took position on the left, in the brush, and did much effective service. Finally, he discovered a company of men off some distance, in the rear, who seemed not to be engaged in the fight. Thinking this strange, as he knew Cockrell had no men that ought to be idle, he rode over to them and asked why they were not engaged in the fight. Their reply was, they had no ammunition. He then told them to hold on and he would get them some, and at once rode back to where his men were in line and gathered up considerable ammunition, his men always carrying an extra supply, and returned back to the company in the rear and distributed it among them. As he was about to leave he met the Captain, and at once discovered, as he thought, that he had been mistaken in the men, and that they were Federal militia, instead of Confederates. Quick as thought he determined to correct the mistake he had made, and told the Captain he had orders from headquarters to tell him to hold his men in that position until further orders. After some few words with the militia Captain, Cole Younger rode back to his command and made several successful charges before the fight terminated.

PARTICULARS OF THE BATTLE.

Much has been said and written about the events which occurred during the late war, but as yet nothing of a definite character has been written about the battle of Lone Jack, Missouri. An eye-witness and participant in the whole affair, furnishes us the following:

The battle was fought on Saturday, the 16th day of August, 1862. Lone Jack is a small village situated in the eastern part of Jackson county, Missouri. About the first of August, 1862, Col. Bard. Cockrell was commanding a small battalion of Confederate troops then stationed at the mouth of Frog Bayou, a small tributary of the Arkansas river, which empties its waters into said stream about fifteen miles below Fort Smith. Fort Smith, as many are aware, is one of the principal commercial towns of the State of Arkansas, and is situated upon the right bank of the Arkansas river, 405 miles from its mouth. From this place Col. Cockrell advanced with his command, by the way of Cane Hill, Arkansas, a small inland town, situated in the western part of the State, upon the Cherokee line. We camped at this place one day and night, cooking up rations for our mess. They marched from this place by way of Cross Hollows, Arkansas, and entered Missouri south of Newtonia. This is a small village, located in the eastern part of Newton county, Missouri. At this place the Federals had a Military post established, which was held by the Missouri Militia. They had the Government stores deposited there for all of their troops then acting in that part of Southwest Missouri. On the evening of the 12th of August, 1862, a feint attack was made upon this place, in order to draw, or cause the enemy to evacuate the small garrisoned towns along the line between Kansas and Missouri, for this was their stronghold, and all their essentials and necessaries were here deposited. It was absolutely necessary that they should hold this place at all hazards, as if lost it would be the death-knell to those other towns held in this part of the State, for some months to come. Their forces stationed at other places in the vicinity, when Newtonia was threatened, were by orders of the commanding officer of this district, to evacuate and flock to the defence of Newtonia. For an inland post it was well fortified, being enclosed by a stone fence or a wall five feet high, and of the proper thickness to shelter them from ordinary assaults from the outside. Inside of this wall was a stone barn, also surrounded by a stone wall.

After skirmishing with the Federals until nightfall, the cavalry fell back two miles, feeding the animals and resting until 8 o'clock at night. They then made another feint on the place, and found out the troops from other towns were hastening to the defence of Newtonia. Col. Cockrell, perceiving that his purpose for attacking the place was fully accomplished, drew off his troops and made a forced march for Northwest Missouri, passing through the western tier of counties bordering upon Kansas. Col. J. T. Coffee had entered Missouri southwest of Springfield, some days before Cockrell had come into the State, and had proceeded upon that line as far north as Humansville. The Federal Militia being too numerous, and it becoming rather uncomfortably hot for his handful of men, from this place Col. Coffee marched west as far as the west part of St. Clair county. While here he learned from a small scouting party of Cockrell's that he, Cockrell, was passing up the line between Missouri and Kansas, with a batallion of five hundred men, making his way to Northwest Missouri. Col. Coffee immediately dispatched a courier to overtake Col. Cockrell and say to him that he, Coffee, was on a forced march to overtake him, Cockrell, and wished to act with him while in the State of Missouri. To this request Col. Cockrell acquiesced, stopping at Pleasant Gap, Missouri, until Col. Coffee came up, which was but a few hours afterwards.

Col. Coffee had a command of about two hundred men; Col. Tracey had about two hundred, and Col. Hunter, who had been acting with Cockrell since he entered the State had a small force of new recruits. When the whole force were consolidated they had about nine hundred men.

From this place they made a forced march, aiming to get to Jackson county before the news could be dispatched ahead of the command by the enemy. I would here remark that they did not enter the State for the purpose of fighting battles, unless the safety of the command demanded it. Their sole object was for the purpose of recruiting for the Confederate army of the Trans-Mississippi Department. They had learned while in Arkansas that there were many men in the brush in Missouri who had been driven from their homes and dear ones by the Militia, who had entire control of the State at that time. It was also said that the Militia had threatened every man who was southern in his sympathies and feelings, or sympathized with the cause of the South, with instant death, if they did not come into the posts and surrender themselves to the Federal authorities. Such an order, it was said, had been issued, and this inspired every true patriot who was devoted to the land of his birth, and the cause of his people, and made all feel called upon to rally to the support of their friends and release them from the cruel hands of their oppressors.

By this time recruits in squads of from five to fifteen began to join our command. The Confederate Cavalry entered Lone Jack on the evening of the 15th of August, about six o'clock, halting but a few moments to get what news could be gathered, not even dismounting, and also to ascertain a suitable place to camp that night, as they wished rations for the men and provender for the horses. After the desired information had been obtained, Col. Cockrell led his command on about two miles, to a wooded pasture, northwest of Lone Jack.

This town took its name from a great black jack tree, which stands upon the high prairie a short distance south of town. The tree can be seen to this day, but we learn it has ceased to put forth its foliage, as of yore.

Col. Coffee went into camp about half a mile southwest of Lone Jack, upon the Pleasant Hill road. Col. Tracey camped not far from Col. Cockrell.

About eight o'clock the same evening 985 Federal cavalry entered town, with two pieces of artillery, commanded by Maj. Foster, acting as Colonel. Col. Cockrell had been well acquainted with Maj. Foster before the war, and even up to the time of the breaking out of the war, he having lived in Warrensburg, Mo., the home of Col. Cockrell. He was known to be a brave and resolute man. The Federal troops were mounted on excellent horses, armed with Spencer rifles, Colts' dragoon revolvers, and had two pieces of artillery, being brass pieces, and were a portion of an Indian brass battery of eleven guns. To use their own words, they had been sent out from Lexington, Mo., to capture Quantrell, who had captured Independence, Mo., a few days previous, killing several of the Federal troops. It seemed that word had been sent to Lexington that Quantrell was to be in Lone Jack on the 16th of August, and the Federal authorities believed the information they had received to be authentic, and were still of this opinion until the battle was over. These facts were learned from one of their men who was captured, who was one of their gunners, and the only one who survived, the balance falling in action. Quantrell was not in the town on the 16th, having gone above Independence with the most of his men about nine o'clock the night previous. Col. Cockrell had received word that Lone Jack was in the possession of the Federals. At this time but few families were living in the town, but those who were there were as true as steel to the Confederate cause. Those ladies, as there was nobody but women and children, were true patriots, and when the Federals endeavored to find out from them where Quantrell and his men had gone to, they knew nothing about it. Not supposing or knowing of any other Confederate troops being in the country, they did not inquire about any but Quantrell's men. As soon as Col. Cockrell had received the information that the Federals were in town, he ordered his men to mount their horses. They then marched out, coming into the road that leads from Lone Jack to Independence. After arriving at a point of timber, at the edge of the prairie, they halted, dismounted, and hitched their horses.

The men were then ordered to fall into line, which was done at short notice, and marched directly down the road some distance, and were then formed in line of battle. The line run parallel with the road, on a piece of low land. This was about ten o'clock at night. After remaining in line a short time, the men were ordered to lie down in line upon their arms and await further orders. Col. Jackman gave orders to his men to be silent, as the enemy were expected upon that road.

Jackman said to his men: "Soldiers, there are about one thousand Federal cavalry in Lone Jack, having with them two pieces of artillery. This fact I learned from a citizen of the town, who left there after the enemy came in. They are all well armed and mounted upon good horses. If they don't spy out our whereabouts to-night, we will attack them at early dawn on the coming of the morrow. Men, I feel that we are going to have a hard fight of it, as the enemy is commanded by a very resolute officer, one who knows no fear upon the field of battle, and I suppose his men are picked cavalry-men, selected from different regiments. What leads me to think so is this—they have come out from Lexington in search of Quantrell and his band of braves, and they know full well it will take men of extraordinary nerve to cope with Capt. Quantrell anywhere in Jackson county, and especially in the Sny hills." Some one said, "Colonel, can't we get out of it without a fight?" "No," said the Colonel, "those Federals are now close, in striking distance, and mounted on much better animals than we have; and moreover, they are fat and in excellent plight. The most of ours are jaded down. Therefore, if we were to endeavor to flee from the country, we would be overtaken and the most of us cut down by the enemy. Thus you will see that we are compelled to offer battle in the morning, and we, my brave soldiers, must gain a decided victory over the enemy or leave our bodies upon the field of battle. And I know full well you possess the nerve. Never has nerve yet forsaken you while upon the field of battle, in the face of the invaders of our most happy and prosperous country, where our loved ones dwelt in peace, plenty and happiness. Therefore, if we engage the enemy in battle in the morning, let each and every one of us resolve to conquer or die upon the field, and we will gain a decided victory over the foe, who has caused so many mothers, wives and sisters to weep and wail over the loss of their dear ones, who have been shot down in cold blood by the thieving, cut-throat militia of Missouri, aided by the Kansas Red Legs and Jayhawkers. The most brutal murders ever recorded in the pages of history are no comparison to some of those committed in Missouri."

This short speech of the Colonel caused an unquenchable flame of patriotism and revenge to burn within the breast of almost every man, many of whom had their dear fathers and affectionate brothers shot down in cold blood, at the dark hours of midnight, as well as by day.

They lay in this position until day began to break in the eastern horizon. Col. Jackman then ordered the men into line. They mounted their horses and marched down the road until they were within a half mile of town; then filing to the left, to the timber or wooded ridge, they dismounted, leaving the unarmed men to take care of the horses, and detailing a squad of 65 men, armed, to guard them. The remainder of the force was ordered into line and led by Col. Jackman down the Lone Jack road, to within 300 yards of the town, to a steam mill. By this time daylight was fast making its appearance. Col. Cockrell was to command the entire field, while Jackman, Tracey and Hunter were to lead the men into action. Tracey was to attack the enemy on the East, and Jackman upon the West, Col. Hunter acting with Jackman. Col. Coffee had not yet come up with his command. Cockrell advanced to within a few yards of the enemy to ascertain their position, and soon returned with the information that the enemy was still asleep and occupied the town, with but one set of pickets out, on the Lexington road, about a quarter of a mile from town. It was determined to attack the enemy at the earliest moment.

Col. Cockrell directed Col. Tracey to cross the Lexington road north of the Federal pickets, and at a certain given signal to attack them with vigor on the east of town. This signal was the firing upon the pickets on the Lexington road. The town stretches away to the south and north with one main street, 60 or 100 feet in width. The business houses and dwellings were strung along on both sides of the street, some two or three hundred yards. Upon the east and west of the town were cornfields, which lay just in the rear of the buildings, with the exception of here and there an idle field, then in grass several feet high. The steam mill was situated in a ravine or hollow, and near by was a beautiful fresh water spring. The ravine took its rise directly south of the mill, some three hundred yards, in the field west of town. Jackman ordered his men to open the fence in the ravine, and then marched his command of five hundred men directly up this ravine until he came in front of the town. Here he halted and formed in line of battle. They were now about 250 yards west of town. The lowness of the ground upon which the line was formed, and the tall, rank weeds upon the rising ground in front, entirely hid the command from the enemy, even if they had been up in camp, but the stillness of their camp plainly told they were yet asleep, and perhaps dreaming of home and the dear ones left behind, all of which they were doomed never more to see on earth. They were now in battle array, ready for the conflict which was about to ensue. Jackman's men were in the height of enjoyment, and jokes were freely passed up and down the line. They soon learned that all was right, and they were ready and eager for the word or orders to be given to move upon the enemy.

Jackman walked up and down the line, telling the men as soon as the firing commenced on the Lexington road, north of town, he wanted the entire line to move forward, no man to break ranks, and to move forward in silence, without a cheer from any one. Tracey was moving around upon the east, and the detail, which had been sent to fire on the pickets, had not yet been carried out. It was thought that the attention of the Federals would be drawn in that direction, expecting an attack from that quarter, while Jackman would attack them on the left and rear, and Tracey attack them upon the right. An attack thus made, with vigor and resolution, was expected to crown the Confederate arms with victory in a short time. But there was too much delay in attacking the enemy's outpost.

The sun was now rising from beneath a cloudless eastern horizon, and pouring its golden streams over the flowery prairie, which was so thickly strewn with beautiful blossoms upon every hand, and lighting up the entire landscape with the silvery orb of day. Yet all was apparently still at the distant town, where the foe was slumbering. Yet soon, very soon, blood was to flow, and some of Missouri's bravest sons were to water the earth with their blood.

At length the enemy's camp guard discovered Tracey's troops upon the east. Immediately thereafter the Sergeant of the Guard was called. They could hear the call distinctly. Very soon the camp was aroused from slumber, with the news that Quantrell's men were upon them! This started every man to his feet. They commenced to move out their "bull-dog" guns in order to fire upon Tracey's men, when the detail which had been sent to fire on the pickets at length opened fire. But they had delayed too long. The enemy were fully apprised of their presence. Jackman at once ordered his men forward, telling them to keep silent until they reached the fence in the rear of town. But when the line got within about 70 yards of the fence, the men were so eager for the fight that they raised a yell. This developed their line, and the enemy poured a galling fire into their ranks. They had intended to surprise the enemy, but as matters now stood, their only reliance was on stubborn fighting. Their artillery had opened fire on Tracey's command, and were throwing shells at him in rapid succession; but they were too close to do much execution.

Col. Tracey was struck upon the foot with a piece of shell, and was so disabled that he had to quit the field. But his captains only fought the harder. Tracey's men pressed forward and gained the fence upon the east of town, which was made of boards, and then they had to pass through a perfect sheet of fire to gain the hedge, behind which the Federal troops were; but there was no such word as fail, and on those brave troops rushed until they had driven the enemy from their position. They then took refuge in the buildings of the town. As the Rebels took possession of the west of the town they found the enemy directly in front, with their line of battle formed in the rear of their horses, which were hitched to the town fencing and served to shelter them from the musketry. But as soon as fire was opened Jackman discovered that they were massing in the rear of the horses, and he ordered his men to shoot them down. One round cleared away the animal breastwork. Most of the horses were shot dead, and those that were wounded broke loose and dashed wildly through the enemy's lines, who fled to the farm houses. Some took shelter in the out-houses, while others formed behind them.

This sheltered them from Jackman's fire upon the west, but exposed them to Tracey's upon the east. Jackman's and Tracey's lines were about one hundred yards apart, and the enemy between. So the reader can see that the Confederate lines were so close together that the fire from one could not help but take effect upon the other. As the enemy would show themselves at the doors and windows of the house, the Rebels kept up a lively fire. Now and then could be seen squads of them rushing from behind the buildings, as Jackman's men would pour volley after volley into them, or Tracey's men, as the case might be. Their artillery was still playing upon the Confederates, consequently orders were given and gallantly obeyed, to a part of Jackman's and Tracey's men, for those gallent sons of Missouri to charge the guns. As they rushed boldly forward, they poured volley after volley into the gunners, at only a few feet distant. It looked like a hand-to-hand fight. Those cannoneers were brave men indeed; they stood to their guns until the last moment—all cut down but one.

The artillery was at length captured. The battery was planted alongside of a long wooden blacksmith-shop, where they concluded to make a stand and defend their hard gained prize; but the enemy could not think of giving up those beautiful guns without an effort upon their part to recapture them, consequently they formed a company or two in rear of the shop, a portion of their men taking possession of the shop and poured a deadly fire into the Confederates, at a few paces, which was hotly contested for a few moments. Finally, finding resistance no longer prudent, the Confederates fell back to their former position, and kept up a brisk fire upon the enemy. Jackman's men had gone into battle with only six rounds of ammunition. It had now given out. He had sent a detail after ammunition, but it had not yet arrived. Finally, Jackman ordered his men to quit the field and retire to the ordnance wagon, where they could draw ammunition. On arriving at the ordnance wagon, we found that the ammunition had been served. The detail was sitting upon a wagon mule, with the box which contained the cartridges before him upon the animal. Some of the command, however, never left the field. They had got into the cartridge boxes of the dead enemy, and were sending back to them their ammunition in hot haste. It was not long, however, until the Confederates were supplied with ammunition, when they returned to the battlefield and took possession of their old position and opened fire upon their combatants at close quarters. The hour looked critical for the Confederates. But all seemed to believe that victory would yet perch upon their banner. At times it seemed that the victory had been won.

The enemy seemed much better prepared now than at first. They had secreted themselves in every possible place in the town, and were sitting with cocked guns in hand waiting for an opportunity to discharge them at close range. They were upon the west side of the town, in a hotel, a large two story building. This building was completely crowded with them, and as Jackman's men came upon the field, many of them were cut down by the enemy's fire from the hotel building. Col. Jackman, Capt. Bryant, Capt. Bradley and three or four soldiers, had come upon the field and were standing close together, about forty paces from the hotel building, when a volley came from the windows of the second-story and cut all down but the Colonel and one other, five men being shot dead, and one slightly wounded. Col. Jackman stepped over the dead and wounded, and looking toward the hotel, his very eyes flashing with revenge, and his cheeks lit up with the red glow which was common with him upon the battle-field. He seemed determined to revenge the blood of the slain—those gallant Captains that had fallen, and in calm but determined words, called out to his men to set the building on fire. A dozen or more raised the yell and made for the building, but several fell in the attempt to fire the hotel. The building, however, was soon on fire, and very soon wrapped in the flames of the devouring element. Many of their men rushed out with cocked guns in their hands, but the Confederates were also ready and shot them down as they rushed out. Many never left the house, but were burned to death. As the lady of the house attempted to leave the building, having been forced to remain inside by the soldiers, as was afterwards learned, she was shot down in the street. The loss of this Southern lady mortified the Confederates, but they were not aware that she was in the building, and the fatal shot was purely accidental. Their very hearts bled at the sight of her dead body, as many of them had been furnished by her with shelter and provisions. According to the best information obtainable, nine wounded men in the building burned to death.

The battle then raged with all the horrors of war from one end of the town to the other. It was plainly to be seen that the forces of the enemy were thinning out much more so than the Confederates, although they had lost a great many brave soldiers, though their force was a still formidable one. They were to be seen on the tops of houses, behind chimneys, and took every advantage of shelter from the bullets of the Confederates. Yet the Confederates would pick their men off, and they could be seen dropping from the tops of buildings with a dull and heavy sound. At length they commenced running around in every direction, endeavoring to make their escape, while the Confederates poured volley after volley into them, and they were cut down as the grass before the mower. The Confederates seemed resolved to make it a lasting and decisive victory. The screams and yells of the men as they came together, in deadly conflict, made the very earth tremble. Many times they were not ten paces apart. The battle raged in this terrible manner for three long hours. Finally, the Federals were completely hemmed in upon three sides. The only outlet was upon the south side of town. At length orders were given to press them at every point, and the Confederates rushed upon them with terrible fury, and for a short time there was a hand-to-hand fight, almost throughout the whole field of battle. The screams of the wounded and dying fell upon every ear. Tongue nor pen could not portray the scenes of blood. The smoke and blaze of powder brought to mind all the dreadful realities of a very hell. Brave men on both sides had met in battle, and there was no disposition to give way so long as the least hope of victory remained.

The Federals at length became satisfied there was no longer any use to contend for victory, their comrades having stood up bravely in the fight, but were being cut down like grass before the scythe. At length they commenced to retreat through the only avenue left them for escape, which was south of town. Here they made a short stand, solely with the view of getting some of their dead and wounded off the field, and were soon seen flying, panic-stricken, making their way, headlong, for Lexington, on the Missouri river, with nearly one-half of their original number lost, the remainder terribly demoralized. Thus was Col. Foster honorably defeated.

The principal part of the troops engaged in this terrible battle, on the Confederate side, were from the counties of Bates, Vernon and St. Clair. St. Clair county lost in killed and wounded, 37 men. The entire Confederate loss was 36 killed dead on the field of battle, and 134 wounded, many of which were mortal. Two months afterwards the Confederate loss amounted to 72, including those who were killed dead on the field, and those who died from the wounds received in the battle. The Federal loss, as reported, was 136 killed on the field of battle and 550 wounded, many of whom died afterwards. Many of the Federal wounded were carried off the field during the fight, and sent to Lexington. Col. Foster himself was wounded in several places, and his brother, Capt. Foster, then acting Major, was mortally wounded, and died shortly after.

In a conversation with one of Col. Foster's men, whom we met at Monegaw Springs, in the autumn of 1869, he said one regiment, the one he was in, lost 450 men in all, killed and wounded. His regiment was never reorganized afterwards. He said he was in Company C, and their company came out of the fight with only two sound men.

The Confederates carried those fine brass guns to Arkansas. All told, the battle lasted about six hours. After the battle the Confederates fell back two miles southwest, to cook rations, procure forage, and care for the wounded. It was then about noon. They then took up their line of march for the South, hotly pressed by the Federals, who had, in the meantime, received new recruits. Some of the Confederates had lost so much sleep that they fell from their horses on the route and were picked up by the enemy, who, when they learned the condition of the men, did not attempt to secure them as prisoners, and the result was that as soon as many of them had secured sufficient rest and sleep to restore them to their proper minds, they rode off and made their way to their old comrades in Arkansas. The Federals followed them until the Arkansas line was reached.

Col. John T. Coffee was accused of acting cowardly at the battle of Lone Jack. This is an error. It is true Col. Coffee was not in the battle, but it was unavoidable on his part, as he was misled on the night of the 15th of August from his camp on the Pleasant Hill road, south of town. His aim was to reach Cockrell's command that night. Nearly all of that country, at that time, was fenced up, upon the main road. There were large gates through which travellers had to pass. Coffee and all of his men were unacquainted in that part of the country, consequently they became bewildered in the darkness of the night and could not find the desired route. The Colonel finally succeeded in obtaining a guide, who proved to be an enemy. After the fellow had led Col. Coffee miles and miles in the contrary direction, about two o'clock in the morning he deserted him, leaving him in a 200 acre cornfield. Here he was compelled to stay until morning. When day broke the Colonel was informed by a lady that his guide had led him southwest of Lone Jack, instead of northwest, where he wanted to go, to join Cockrell's command. Coffee was now ten miles from Lone Jack. He, however, started in that direction, hoping to hear something of Col. Cockrell. After marching within six miles of Lone Jack, and hearing nothing of Cockrell, he stopped to rest his men. Hearing no report of fire arms, he finally concluded that Cockrell had left that part of the country. But while breakfasting his men, two men, who seemed to be dispatch bearers, came up. On questioning them, Col Coffee found out they belonged to Quantrell's command, and had been sent out upon a scout. Coffee asked them if there were any troops in the direction of Lone Jack. Yes, was the reply, Col. Cockrell has been fighting the Federals ever since sun up this morning. Haven't you heard the artillery? The Colonel replied, I have not. Coffee then ordered his men to mount their horses. This was about ten o'clock. Coffee went within about a half mile of the battle-field, dismounted his men, and hastened to the scene of the conflict. When he arrived the enemy were flying in every direction, the battle was over, and the brave enemy was defeated.

After the battle of Lone Jack, Cole Younger and his men disbanded, temporarily, well knowing that the whole Federal force within striking distance would completely scour the country.

ASSASSINATION OF HIS FATHER.

About the first of September he heard of the murder of his father, and at once determined to go and look once more upon his face, though cold in death. Quantrell tried to induce him not to go, telling him that he certainly would be killed, as there was no doubt they were on the watch for him, expecting him to return home. But go he would, let the consequences be what they may, and when Quantrell saw this was Younger's determination, he urged him to take a detail with him. But this Cole thought to be an unwise movement, and felt satisfied he could do much better alone. The death of his father sorely grieved him; he could not rest easy, and a bitter feeling of revenge showed itself upon every feature of his face, and was manifest in every utterance when speaking of him to whom he was greatly attached. He made the trip alone, looked upon the remains of his beloved father, never shedding a tear, and, placing his right hand upon his cold forehead, without uttering a word, resolved within his own mind to revenge his death or lose his own life in the attempt.

After returning to camp he called his men together and related to them the circumstances of the murder and robbery of his dear old father, and all for the sake of a few hundred dollars, endeavoring to arouse all their bitter feelings, and asked them to assist him in his efforts to wreak vengeance upon those guilty of the heinous crime. After this he was continually on the alert with twenty picked men.

THE PLEASANT HILL FIGHT.

On the 5th of October, 1862, while roaming around, he chanced to ride to Pleasant Hill, and on entering the town learned that Col. Neugent was there with forty men. After deliberating a moment he concluded to give him battle. The war whoop was at once raised, and he dashed into town and among Neugent's men, scattering them in every direction, killing and wounding many, while he did not lose a single man. The town of Pleasant Hill is situated in Cass county, Missouri.

ANOTHER SKIRMISH.

On the 10th of October, 1862, Jennison and Anthony, two notorious Kansas Jayhawkers, made a raid into Jackson county, Missouri, burning houses, stealing horses and almost everything else of value they could conveniently carry off, and murdering indiscriminately. They marched under the black flag. Quantrell was on the lookout for them, while Younger dogged Jennison at every turn. At length Jennison received large reinforcements and the whole country was filled with Jayhawkers. A general sortie was kept up by Quantrell's men, and small parties of the Jayhawkers were frequently cut off, while their pickets were engaged whenever an opportunity offered. Jennison made a dash on Quantrell one day in an open field, when Quantrell rode over a hill and watched an opportunity to strike with telling effect, and when followed by Jennison, he made a desperate charge on the Federal forces. Cole Younger led the charge, while Quantrell held in reserve a force of men ready to assist or strike in another direction, as circumstances should develop themselves. Younger, in leading the charge, held a pistol in each hand and guided his horse by holding the reins in his teeth. In making the charge he was several times heard yelling: "give them hell, boys." His brave little band nobly rushed to the front, spreading death and destruction on every side, which caused the Jayhawkers to flee, and fall back on their reserve forces. When the Federals were forced to retreat, Younger rode off to where Quantrell was and they consulted as to the best plan to be pursued. It was finally determined that as the men and horses were tired and hungry, to disband for a few days, in order to gain rest and procure food for both man and beast, as both had but little of either for several days. The men were then divided up into small squads, under faithful leaders.

HORSE STEALING.

About this time there seemed to be a well organized band of horse-thieves roaming through the country, and many horses were stolen. Finally, Quantrell determined to put a stop to it, and Cole Younger was detailed to keep watch in Cass county, Missouri, for the purpose of capturing a band of thieves, while Quantrell watched Jackson county, Missouri. On the 20th of October Younger went to Austin, in Cass county, for the purpose of capturing a band of thieves, which was finally accomplished, and he turned them over to Quantrell, who dealt with them as their crimes deserved.

QUANTRELL GOES SOUTH.

Quantrell, as usual about this season of the year, went South, leaving Cole Younger and George Todd, each of whom had a company of men, to act for themselves, but their forces were consolidated and concert of action had whenever it was deemed advisable.

IN PREPARED CAVES.

Cole Younger then took his men and went into camp on Cedar Creek, in caves or dirt houses prepared for that purpose, where he remained for several weeks, and until a severe snow storm visited that section of the country. This had the tendency to very materially interfere with his successfully eluding the pursuit of the Federals, as his whereabouts could be easily found out by tracks through the snow, for provisions and forage were short, and he was compelled to send out for both. When they were at length compelled to visit corn-cribs, &c., after leaving they would get some member of the families on whose premises they went, to drive the cattle around, drag over their tracks in the snow with felled trees, and resort to every possible strategy to cover up the route they had taken.

A SPY IN CAMP.

About this time a spy came into camp, who claimed to have belonged to the Confederate army. He told a pitiful and plausible story of the inhuman treatment he had received at the hands of the Federals, by whom he had been taken prisoner. His story of wrongs seemed to impress itself upon Cole Younger, and he believed what the fellow told him. George Todd, by some means, had received unfavorable reports about the man and at once went and told Younger what he had heard, at the same time advising him to either shoot him or else turn him out of camp. But Younger's sympathy had become too much enlisted for the stranger, and he not only told Todd that he should remain in camp, but also said that he would protect him. Upon investigation it was found that Jobe McCorkell, one of Younger's men, had served with him in the Confederate army. Younger, taking the statement of McCorkell to be correct, was still further satisfied that the man was not a spy.

On the morning of the 10th of December, 1862, Younger's visitor reported to him that he had received intelligence that his wife was very sick, and asked permission to visit her. At first Younger hesitated to grant his request, but finally consented, telling him he must not be gone over two hours. The stranger departed, but he had scarcely left camp before a general discussion arose among the men as to whether he was true or false, many determining in their own minds that there was something about him they did not fancy, and who put it down as their firm belief that he was a spy, sent there for the purpose of betraying them. Some of them seemed to be so well satisfied in their own minds that the fellow was sent into camp for a purpose, that they offered to bet he would not return. At this time the men were busily engaged in currying and feeding their horses, playing cards, &c. One of the men, named Oliver Shepherd, was currying his horse in front of the cave, and his horse kept up such a smelling and looking about that he called Younger and told him something was wrong. Younger told him that was all imagination, but he insisted and said, "By God, there is something up, as my mare keeps smelling, and I think she smells Feds." Younger then remarked that he supposed it was Todd coming, as he was looking for him to come up about that time. Shepherd replied: I know my mare too well for that, I know she would not make such demonstrations unless there were Federals around. Younger then glanced over the ridge, and at a short distance discovered a body of men approaching with an officer in front, who he at first took to be Todd. Younger then called to him, Is that you, Todd? He received no reply, and at once ordered his men into line, as infantry, they not having time to mount their horses. About the time the line was formed, Noah Webster, one of Younger's men, discovered a body of men in their rear. Just at this moment the officer commanding those who were approaching in front, sang out: All right, Cole, we are Todd's men.

By this time Younger felt satisfied that they were Federals, and at once gave orders to his men, "Let into them, boys." As the fire was opened upon those in front, the rear column opened fire on Younger's men, killing three of them. A desperate fire was kept up on those in front, until at length the Federals made a bold and daring charge upon Younger. The latter, seeing he was completely surrounded, and knowing full well that his visitors had entrapped him, at once resolved to cut his way out or die in the attempt. Leading his men on the double-quick down the hollow, he forced his way through the Federal column in front, when they closed up in his rear and pursued. He then made a rapid retreat. He had not retreated far, however, until he discovered that the sleet upon the snow was so slippery that a rapid retreat could not be made, and the men were forced to pull off their boots and throw them away. While they were doing this, they were under a heavy fire. After a forward movement was again commenced, one of the men called out to Younger that he could not get one boot off. Younger then halted the men and went and pulled off the remaining boot himself. The Federals were pressing them hard, particularly the cavalry. A running fight was kept up the balance of the day, some four hours. About sundown they struck the main road, leading to Harrisonville, and followed it some distance, until they came to another road leading off to the right, which they took and kept until they arrived at a bridge, which crossed a creek. Here they jumped from the bridge into the creek, and waded down the creek about a mile, until they came to a stone fence, which they mounted and followed for nearly a half mile, hoping thereby to effectually elude the pursuit of the Federals, which they knew would be made the following day. Some time after dark they arrived at a house which proved to be occupied by friendly parties, where they were furnished with something to eat. After supper and resting, the men divided up into pairs and scattered in every direction, instructions being given them to get clothing as best they could, and make their way back to Todd's camp as soon as possible.

In a few days all of Younger's men, except the three killed, found their way back to the camp of Todd, though much fatigued, and with bruised and lacerated feet. The citizens throughout the country supplied them with the required clothing, as best they could. During their retreat, after the Federals had ceased following them, they chanced to discover an old blind horse, which they secured and rode around through some sumac for the purpose of destroying their tracks in the snow. At another time a farmer cut down a tree, leaving the limbs on it, hitched a yoke of cattle to it and dragged it over the snow where they had passed. These little incidents are named in order to show the precaution taken to prevent the Federals making a successful pursuit the next morning. At the time they were attacked most of their horses were running around loose, and when the firing commenced the greater portion of them made for their homes, as nearly all lived close to camp. The citizens, learning of the affair, took some pains, as did Todd's men also, to gather them up. In a short time they were all mounted again.

YOUNGER GETS A BETTER HORSE.

On the 20th of January, 1863, Cole Younger and a companion started to go home, near Lee's Summit, when they met three Federals in the road, two white men and one negro. Younger and his partner not being very well mounted, at once conceived the idea that the present offered an excellent opportunity to secure better animals, and when they got within shooting distance of the Federals, opened fire on them, when they broke and ran away. After pursuing them some distance they came to a house, in front of which was standing a fine horse, with a lady's saddle on. Younger halted alongside the fence, dismounted, threw the reins of his horse's bridle over the post, unloosed the horse with the lady's saddle on, mounted, and pursued rapidly until he overtook the negro, when he unhorsed him and appropriated his horse and equipments to his own use. He then returned the horse which he borrowed, with a lady's saddle on, and as he did so he was requested to wait a moment, when a Confederate flag was presented him, with the wish that he might carry it to victory on every occasion, which he promised to do. After going home and remaining a day or two, he again returned to camp and reorganized his men.

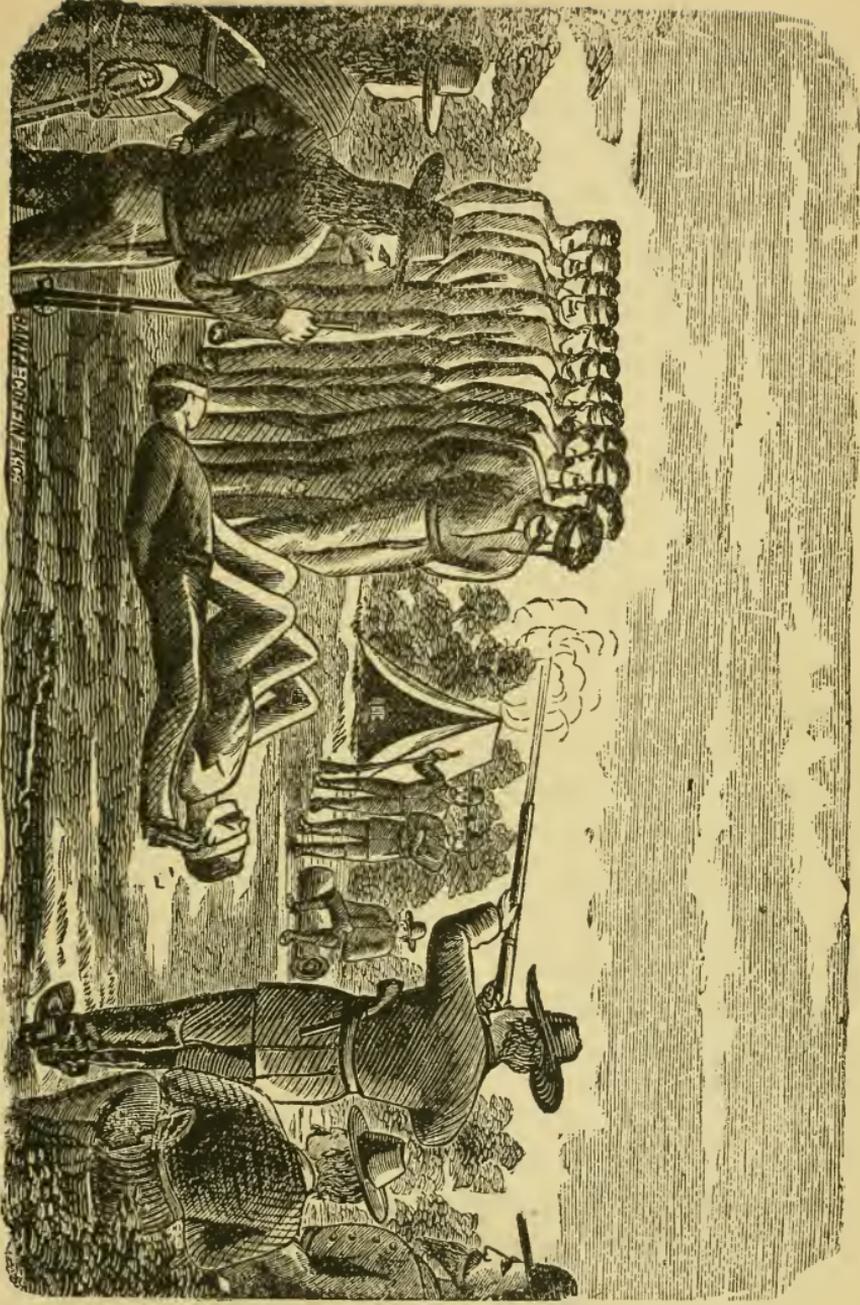

ARREST OF THREE MISS YOUNGERS.

About the first of November, 1862, the Federal officer in command at Independence, arrested three of the Miss Younger's, sisters of Cole Younger, and placed them in jail, because, as he said, they had fed their brother Cole. Also three or four of Younger's cousins, females, were arrested and kept prisoners at Kansas City, and were in the building which was undermined and fell down, killing eight out of the nine ladies, prisoners at the time. This was one of the most disgraceful and brutal outrages committed during the war. They did not have the courage to openly execute these ladies, but arrested and placed them in the building, which was built of brick, and then secretly undermined it so that it would fall and so mangle them as to cause their death. If we mistake not, but one was killed instantly, all the rest having been bruised and mangled in a horrible manner, and suffering for some time in the greatest agony before death came to their relief. This took place in the winter of 1862-63.

TRAP SET TO CAPTURE YOUNGER.

AMERICAN ENGRAVER

Mrs. Younger to come down and see him, but not being able to go, on account of sickness, she sent him word to that effect and requested him to come out to the farm and see her, which he did. While there he promised her that if she would see Cole and get him to go South, he would give them both a free pass. This she promised to do, as soon as she could send him word. After this Davidson kept a close watch on her house, hoping to capture Cole, thinking he would come home to see his mother. At length word was sent him, Davidson, that Younger was at home, when that same night the HOUSE WAS SURROUNDED BY 100 MEN, determined to capture him, dead or alive. Cole rode near the house and then dismounted and hitched his horse in the orchard, after which he cautiously approached the house, in order to ascertain if any soldiers were about. After entering he got Sue, a faithful old negro servant, to stand guard outside, also one of his sisters. The night being very dark and cold, he determined to risk it without punishing his sister and old Aunty, and, as he said, "would rather fight the Federals than punish them." After all were in the house a short time, a noise was heard outside but it was concluded that it was the sheep out in the lot. Cole was busily engaged talking to his mother, when a knock was heard at the door. Quick as thought old Aunty threw a bed quilt over her, Cole blew out the light, and slipped up behind the old negro, under the quilt. She then went to the door and opened it, when there stood a squad of soldiers, with guns cocked and ready to shoot. The old negro said to them, "Don't shoot; it's me; nothin' but a poor old nigger." In a moment the guns were dropped, and after some little conversation she told them that if they "was gwine to kill the white folks she would git out," and at once passed out towards the barn. The night was very dark, and the Federals did not think of or discover the trick of Younger to make his escape. After getting some distance from the house, Cole dodged out from his hiding place and at once made tracks for a more congenial clime. The old darkey was so much rejoiced at seeing her young master thus narrowly escape death by and through her strategy, that she could not help but yell out, "Run, Massa Cole, for God's sake," which at once attracted the attention of the soldiers in the rear, who fired on him. Had it not been for this little imprudence of the old negro, the Federals would not have discovered him making his escape. Quite a number of shots were fired at him, but without effect, nevertheless they went into the house and reported him dead, and requested a light, accompanied by the family, to go and bring him in. Diligent search was made in the vicinity where he was supposed to be, but his body could not be found. After remaining but a short time, apparently, they all went off, but still kept watch at a respectful distance, thinking he would return to the house, if not too badly wounded. All this time he was sitting some distance off, watching their movements, and eager to "get some of them." Before retiring to bed the old negro procured a bottle of water, mixed with some whiskey, camphor, &c., and then took a light and went out to hunt for her young Massa, Cole, intending, if she should see him, to pass by him and drop the bottle, well knowing that he would need water if he was wounded. She also thought that if she should get close to him he would call her. Although the Federals had departed, apparently, she found that they were still loitering around. The old servant was true and faithful, and would risk her own life to save that of any of the members of the family, but always felt certain that none of the Federals would harm her.

Cole did not go near enough to the house to see if they had discovered his horse, as he supposed they would search the premises until they found him. They did not get his horse, however, although dilligent search was made. The next morning the old negro woman took the horse some distance in the direction of the camp, putting it in a safe place where she knew it would be sent to Massa Cole. He arrived safely in camp.

A LIVELY BRUSH.

On the 10th of March, 1863, Cole Younger and his men, about 40 in number, went to the blacksmith shop of Mr. Hopkins, near Blue Springs, Jasper county, Missouri, for the purpose of having their horses shod, as spring was about opening, and they were preparing for more active operations. The precautionary step of placing out pickets was taken, and after remaining there some time the pickets returned with the news that the Federals were coming. Younger at once formed his men in the brush, for the purpose of "giving them a round or two," and after the lapse of a few minutes the Federals came in sight, the commanding officer, Capt. Johnson, some distance in front. He had about 80 men. The arrangement was that no shots were to be fired until all were within close range, but one of Younger's men, when Capt. Johnson rode up within range, could not resist the temptation of "letting him have it." Johnson cried out: "Don't shoot, we are Federals," thinking those whom he saw were militia. Several shots were fired at Capt. Johnson without effect. At length, seeing that his warning words to "friends" were not heeded, he, doubtless, concluded that he had fallen among enemies, and at once wheeled his horse and made a hasty retreat to the rear. Younger, seeing this movement, at once charged on behind, which caused the Federals to break and run in every direction. Capt. Johnson fired several shots on his retreat, which were the only ones fired, not a single other man of his company discharging a gun. Capt. Johnson tried to rally his men several times, but all to no purpose. They were pursued about one mile and a half, through the timber, and finally rushed into a deep ravine which led to the creek. Younger's men kept up a lively fire on them the whole time, and forced them down the ditch until they reached the back water, when they were compelled to swim the creek. Near one-half of their number was killed. After those who escaped uninjured succeeded in getting over the creek, out of danger, Younger and his men went over the battle-field to gather up such arms, etc., as they deemed of service, and take care of those who were still alive. Finally, a whistle was heard, which clearly indicated that it was intended as a call, and which was immediately answered. At length a sanctimonious looking individual made his appearance and said, "I thought you were all killed." Younger at once perceived that he had mistaken them for Federals, and drawing his revolver, told him to surrender. He at once wheeled his horse and rode rapidly away. Younger and one of his men fired at him, both shots taking effect, and he fell to the ground a lifeless corpse. An examination of his wounds, proved that one shot broke his neck and the other entered the head. Either was fatal. On searching the body a small Bible and hymn-book were found, when it was at once conjectured that he was a minister. It was afterwards ascertained that he was the identical individual who was travelling around with Johnson, going to houses to eat and sleep, and when he was about to leave would offer up prayers, after which he would ask pay for the same, and if it was not forthcoming immediately, would appropriate such articles he could find to his own use as he desired. This would-be Reverend (?) gentleman had gained considerable notoriety in that section of country for these "little peculiarities," and when it became known that he "had handed in his checks," there was considerable rejoicing. Evidently he had "put on the livery of Heaven to serve the Devil in."

FIGHT WITH A DUTCH COMPANY.

On the 15th of May, 1863, Cole Younger went down to Lafayette county, Mo., to see his mother, taking with him a few of his men. As they passed down the road they were bushwacked and made a narrow escape, for, if it had been properly managed, not one of them would have escaped death or capture. After this occurrence Younger determined to try this same little game upon those who perpetrated it upon him. It was not long until he ascertained who it was that perpetrated the "joke," and at once laid his plans to "turn the tables on them." While in Lafayette county, Younger was reinforced by Capt. Pool, with about 20 men. When he was ready to leave, Younger sent a man in advance to inform the Dutch officer that he was coming, telling him what road to watch, and to make a certain point by a certain time and by this means completely trap them. The whole plan worked like a charm; the Dutch officer seemed eager to do up the little job, promising that not one should escape this time, etc. Younger was not disappointed in his expectations, and was on hand in time, ready and willing, with outstretched arms, to receive his dear Dutch friends. By the time appointed along came the valiant Dutch company, the chief officer in the lead, with considerable show and bravado. When they had passed just far enough into the trap, Younger let into them, and of all the surprised and terror-stricken men ever seen, they were the worst. They ran in every direction, closely followed by Younger's men, who poured volley after volley into them. About one-half made their escape, the remainder having been killed. The account of the fight, as given by the Dutch who made their escape, was the most terrible ever related. They seemed to have magnified about 40 men into 4,000, and it was impossible to make any of them believe that they were attacked by less than 4,000 men.

QUANTRELL RETURNS.

The reader will recollect that we previously mentioned the fact that Quantrell went South, leaving Cole Younger and Todd, each of whom had a company of men, to act for themselves, but in connection with each other, whenever circumstances should require it. Some time during the latter part of May, however, Quantrell returned to his old stamping ground, and at once commenced to reorganize his men and make preparations for active operations.

THE LAWRENCE, KANSAS, RAID.

We now come to the famous raid made on Lawrence, Kansas, by Quantrell and his band. This notable and memorable occurrence is yet familiar to thousands throughout the country who were old enough at the time to recollect it. It was heralded all over the country at the time, as the most blood-thirsty, daring and successful raid ever made. The whole thing was admirably planned and well executed, and scarcely anything occurred to interrupt the plans of the men who conceived this master stroke of retaliation and revenge, for such it was.

Jim Lane and his band of Kansas Red Legs had burned and sacked the town of Osceola, St. Clair county, Missouri, one of the most thriving and flourishing towns in Southwest Missouri, situated on the Osage river, murdering many citizens, and Quantrell conceived the idea of retaliation for this and other outrages committed by the Jayhawkers, and consequently selected the home of Lane, quite a thriving town in Kansas, as the best suited for that purpose, hoping also to capture and kill him, in retaliation for those murdered at Osceola, and elsewhere, and in this outdone even Lane himself. It was not the South striking against the North, not a deed done in defense of a country's right, or in retaliation for her wrongs, but in revenge for the wrongs committed by one man, armed and protected in the knowledge of his power, against a mere handful of men, totally incapable of successful resistance. But, desperate character as Quantrell was, he gave orders to his men on entering Lawrence, to "Spare the women and children." He still possessed enough of human feeling to have compassion on youth and beauty. On that bright morning the birds, though disturbed by the noisy tramp of the many horses' hoofs, strange to say, sang just as sweetly as though nothing terrible was going on. The place was wrapped in slumber when Quantrell and his men entered. Defence was useless, and, as if by common consent, the town was left to its fate, and all attempted to escape to the ravine running along the western

It was the morning of the 7th of September, 1863, that Quantrell made this memorable dash into Lawrence. But a short time previous he had returned from the South. As soon as he reached his old haunts he commenced to collect his men together and prepare for this raid. His force numbered about 200 men. They were divided into companies, and placed under the command of Cole Younger, Pool, Todd and Quantrell himself, the whole subject to the guidance and control of the latter.

The force was concentrated on Cedar Creek, in Jackson county, Missouri. From Cedar Creek they marched to Grand River, in Cass county, Missouri, and from there they went to Lawrence, Kansas, arriving about daylight. A charge was at once made upon the town, and every Jayhawker they caught, as well as many citizens, were killed. The main body of the troops quartered there were camped on the opposite side of the Kansas River. Quantrell, on his arrival in town, at once placed a force at the ferry to prevent their crossing, until such time as he was ready to leave. The massacre and destruction of property continued nearly all day. The mournful cry of the widows, the groans of the wounded and dying, the roar of the flames as they lapped from building to building, all united in making up one horrible scene, in which the Guerrilla chief and his men seemed to glory. All of the Guerrillas, save one, left the town unharmed, and he, more unlucky than his companions, was left behind, the victim of his intended victims. His body was left sissing and burning by the side of the very building that he fired, and those who now reside in Lawrence and were there at the time, well remember with feelings of pleasure and revenge, that the remaining citizens hung the body of this one Guerrilla up as a pleasing memento.

The murders, destruction of property, and outrages committed generally, by Quantrell and his men, were bad enough when the truth is told, yet we learn from those who were there at the time, that the facts were largely magnified by the newspaper accounts gotten up immediately thereafter. It has been asserted that women and children were murdered, but such was not the case, save by accident. Men were murdered, without regard to age. The destruction of property on this occasion was considerable. But little was carried off, except clothing and such articles as the men required for use.

Of all the men whom Quantrell most desired to capture and execute, Jim Lane was the man. It is asserted that he succeeded in making his escape into a cornfield, unobserved, where he kept hid until after all danger was over. One story is that he went down into a well, but we are inclined to the opinion that he made his escape into a cornfield, as above given. Some of the friends of Quantrell assert that if Lane had been captured shortly after entering town, the destruction of life and property would have been much less than it was. There may be some truth in this version of the affair, but the public will be inclined to doubt it. It is evident that Quantrell went to Lawrence determined on death and the destruction of property, and he succeeded admirably in his purposes.

Late in the afternoon the Guerrillas of Quantrell who were placed at the ferry to prevent the Federal forces from crossing over to Lawrence, were withdrawn, and all took up their line of march for Missouri. As soon as the raid was made on Lawrence, all the Federal and Kansas State troops within striking distance were notified of the fact and ordered to pursue Quantrell on his retreat, and by the time he was ready to move several thousand troops were on his trail, and nothing but the mere mention of the name of Quantrell, which was always a terror to the Jayhawkers, saved him and his men from total destruction. It was estimated that before he left the State of Kansas, seven thousand Federal soldiers and Kansas militia were in pursuit of him, who were distributed all over the route Quantrell had to travel.

Cole Younger was placed in the rear on the retreat, with his command, and, as may be imagined, he had hot work of it, for the main body of the Federals crossed the river as soon as Quantrell's men left, and, being joined by others, at once commenced pursuit. The worn out condition of both the men and horses belonging to Quantrell's command, rendered them totally unfit for hard service, but the rear reliefs were frequent, as it was almost one continued series of fighting.

John Jarrett, with his command, was the first to relieve Cole Younger, who then took the lead. Dave Pool relieved Jarrett, but he was so hard pressed—by this time large Federal reinforcements had arrived—that he was compelled to give way and his men become badly demoralized. Seeing this, Younger and Todd both went to the rear, and finally succeeded in checking the Federal advance. By this time Quantrell, with the main body of his men, had succeeded in getting far in the advance. The rear forces were then rapidly withdrawn.

At times the retreating forces of Quantrell were almost entirely surrounded—the Federals were like a swarm of bees. Several times he was attacked in the front and rear, and on the right and left. It was indeed a most miraculous escape. At times Quantrell almost gave up the idea of ever being able to get through safely with many of his men. Almost a continuous fight was kept up until they reached Grand River, in Cass county, Missouri, at which point Quantrell ordered his men to scatter in small squads, and this, together with the darkness of the night, caused the Federal forces to halt, when Quantrell made good his escape. In this raid Quantrell lost but few men. No fight or raid of importance again occurred for some time, although many skirmishes followed.

REV. DR. FISHER'S EXPERIENCE.

The following is from the Cincinnati Gazette, which was related by the Doctor himself, recently, at a Methodist Preacher's meeting in Cincinnati. The Rev. Dr. was one of Jim Lane's Chaplains during the war. The story, as related by him, is as follows :

"I was always an anti-slavery man of the most 'anti' kind, and after I moved to Kansas, without any prominence having been given to my sentiments by myself, I found myself the object of the most vindictive hatred of the pro-slavery party of the region where I resided. My life was unsuccessfully sought several times. When the war broke out I went as a Chaplain. Most of the male members of my church went to the war, and I went as one of Jim Lane's chaplains.

"The news of my connection with the army, and of my being put in charge of contrabands, who were sent to Kansas, got abroad, and the rebels hated me worse than ever. They got my photograph and distributed it throughout the country, and it was fixed among them that I was to be shot whenever met. Once when I was sent up the river with a body of contrabands, not being well, I went home for a little rest. I was living at Lawrence. The town had a few guns in the armory, and there was an understanding with the farmers of the surrounding country that upon the ringing of an alarm, they should come in and defend the town, but the coming of Quantrell and his men was a complete surprise. When the alarm was rung the arsenal was already captured and on fire. I was in bed, and heard, about 3 o'clock in the morning, horses galloping very rapidly away, and woke my wife, telling her that it was singular that horses should be galloping so fast so early in the morning ; but she said she guessed it was some farmers who had been to a railroad meeting the evening before, and were hurrying back to their work. We lay and talked for some time. The children were going out that morning to get some grapes, and my wife thought she would call them earlier than usual, and herein, brethren, I see the hand of Providence. It was not yet daylight, but day was dawning. Having called the children, she went and looked out of the front door, and instantly called me : ' Pa, the Rebels are in town.' I said that could not be ; but, nevertheless, I sprang from the bed and ran to the door.

" There they were just across the green, and just then they shot the United Brethren preacher, as he was milking his cow in his barn-yard. I rushed back into the house ; my wife caught up her babe ; I have four boys ; one was on my wife's breast, another was by her side, and the two oldest were twelve and fourteen years old. We all rushed up the lot in which our house stood. Then I left my wife, and with the two oldest boys ran up the hill, but something seemed to tell me that I was running away from safety. So I told the boys to run on, and I would go back to mother. It was then in the gray light of morning, and the Rebels had divided into little squads and were ransacking the town, killing every man they found, and burning houses. My boys separated, the oldest getting with a neighbor's boy, Robert Winton, and while the two were running for life the soldiers saw them and fired a volley, killing poor Bobby and frightening my boy almost to death. He ran in and hid among

“In fixing my cellar I had thrown up a bank of earth near the entrance, and I crept down there and laid myself between the mound of earth and the wall in such a way that the earth would partially screen me. I lay up close to the kitchen floor. I had not been there long, when four of Quantrell’s men rode up to the house and demanded admittance. My wife went to the front door and let them in. They demanded whether I was not in the house or in the cellar. She replied: ‘My husband and two oldest boys ran off as soon as the firing began.’ The leader swore that he knew I was in the cellar. My wife replied that she had two young children by her, and that she did not want any more oaths uttered before them. ‘You have doubted my word,’ she replied, ‘you can look for yourselves.’ I lay so near the floor that I could hear every word that was said. The men called for a candle.

“My wife replied that we did not burn candles. Then they wanted a lantern, but she said we hadn’t any. They asked then, with an oath, what we did for a light. She replied that we burned kerosene in a lamp. Then they called for a lamp, and my wife had to get it, but the men in their eagerness to light it, turned the wick down in the oil. Failing to light it themselves, they called on my wife to light it.

“‘Why, you’ve ruined the lamp,’ said she; ‘it can’t be lighted with the wick down in the oil.’

“Yes, there’s one up stairs,” said she, and they then ordered her to go and get it.

“ ‘Gentlemen,’ said she, ‘I can’t do it. Your rudeness has so frightened me that I can scarcely hold my babe.’

“One of the men then offered to hold it for her, and took it from her arms. My poor wife then went and got the lamp, which they lighted and started on their search. They all cocked their revolvers and passed the word to kill me at sight, and started for the cellar. I laid myself as flat as I could, and turned my face toward the wall, for I knew my face was thinnest from ear to ear. The light came to the door.

“I tell you, brethren, I just quit living. You have heard it said that when a man is drowning all his past life comes up before him.”

The speaker’s voice trembled; his eyes became suffused, and his whole frame shook with suppressed emotion as he continued: “I stood then before the judgment seat. I was a dead man. My heart ceased to beat. I already stood before my Judge. Brethren, what could I do, but just trust myself to the Lord.

“The man who carried the light was tall, and providentially stooped so low in entering the cellar that the light shining against the bank of earth threw a shadow over me. They searched the cellar, but did not find me, and went back up stairs. My wife afterwards told me that when the men went down in the cellar, she took her babe and went into the parlor, and stood there holding her hand against one ear, and her babe against the other, expecting every moment to hear the report of the revolvers in the cellar, announcing the death of her husband.

“The soldiers set fire to the house in several places, and leaving one of their number to prevent my wife from putting it out, departed. The man seemed to be touched with pity, and told her that if she wanted to save some furniture he would help her. My wife thinks that holding the babe in his arms touched his heart. She pleaded with him if he had any consideration for her helpless children to leave the house and let her put out the fire. He consented and left.

“My wife then came to me and asked me whether it was all right between me and God. I am afraid they will come back and kill you yet, and it will be the greatest comfort to know that you felt prepared to die.

“I told her that I felt that I was prepared to die.

“Telling me to pray, she left me. It was not long before another party of Quantrell’s men came, and in drunken tones—for the marauders had become intoxicated by this time—demanded whether I was in the house.

“‘Do you suppose,’ said my wife, confidently, ‘that he would stay here and you shooting and burning all over town? No; he left this morning as soon as the firing commenced, and unless some of you have shot him and killed him outside, he is safe. Some of your men were here this morning and searched the house. However, you may look for yourselves.’”

“In this way she bluffed them. They set fire to the house, and left one, who drew his revolver on my wife, and said he would kill her if she tried to put it out. He stayed till the house was so far consumed that there was no possibility of saving it. My wife pulled up a carpet, and, taking it to the yard, dropped it accidentally by the door.

“My wife was afraid, and so was I, that I would be burned alive, for I had now no thought of doing anything but what my wife told me. The floor was on fire almost over me, and the flames were creeping nearer. My wife stood and threw water, pail after pail, on the floor, and was doing this when a neighbor, a Catholic woman, came and said: ‘Why, Mrs. Fisher, what are you doing? What good will it be to save that floor? Besides, you can’t save it.’

“‘I don’t care what good it will do,’ replied my wife, ‘I am going to keep on wetting that floor.’

“But, finally, when she saw she could not save it, she asked the neighbor whether she could keep a secret. She then swore her by the Virgin Mary never to reveal it.

“‘Well, then, said my wife, ‘my husband is under that floor.’

“The soldiers were still everywhere, shooting and burning, and the air was filled with the shrieks of wounded and dying men, the wailings of widows and orphans, and the sound of falling buildings. My wife then called me to come out, and threw a dress over my shoulders. The two women picked up the carpet, and I crawled under it between them, and so we proceeded to a small bush about four feet high, out in the yard.

“There my wife saw four soldiers ready to fire. They were not a hundred yards off. Then, for the first time, the poor woman despaired. A pang then shot to her heart, and she gave up all for lost. Nevertheless, I slunk under the bush, and they threw the carpet over me.

“‘Save the chairs!’ cried my wife; and they rushed to where the chairs were piled, close to the burning building, and ran with them and flung them carelessly upon me, and piled up all that was saved of our household goods about me. The soldiers, evidently, thought the pile only a lot of household furniture, and left it unmolested.

“I staid there till two hours after they left, and then gathered my wife and my four children—for the two boys had come back—and in the garden we knelt and thanked God for deliverance. Brethren, you don't know what it is to be thankful.”

THE BAXTER SPRINGS AFFAIR.

Shortly after the Lawrence, Kansas, raid, Quantrell gathered his men together and went South, but on the way down determined to give the Federal forces stationed at Baxter Springs, Kansas, a slight “shake up.” Accordingly, in October, 1863, they started on their southern trip, by way of Baxter Springs, which place they found strongly guarded and fortified. . After slipping up within shooting distance a few rounds were fired and then a retreat was ordered. They were not pursued, and it was thought the Federals stationed there feared a trap was set for them.

FIGHT WITH GEN. BLUNT'S BODYGUARD.

The next day, while on the road south, Quantrell met Gen. Blunt and his bodyguard, coming up. When Blunt saw Quantrell and his men he took them for Federals, and his brass band at once struck up a lively tune. Quantrell at once formed his men in line of battle, yet Blunt supposed they were forming to fire a salute. Blunt marched on up the road, not anticipating danger, and when they arrived within short range, Quantrell ordered his men to fire on them, which they did with murderous effect, killing nearly all of his men, about 80 in number, with a few exceptions. Gen. Blunt was one of the lucky ones. Blunt was riding in a buggy, and as soon as the firing commenced he jumped out, mounted a fleet horse, which was tied behind the buggy, with saddle and bridle on, and rode rapidly off. Quantrell captured Blunt's buggy and fine match horses, ambulance, brass band instruments, his sword, which was carried South and presented to Gen. Price; also a lot of arms, horses, &c. The men composing the band were about the only ones who made resistance, and they fought to the last. One of Younger's men got killed in charging the band wagon. Quantrell then went south and reported to Gen. Joe. Shelby, and the forces under his command were sent to the Mississippi river. Cole Younger remained here for some time and finally went to California.

COLEMAN AND JOHN YOUNGER

THE CONSOLLAS AFFAIR.

In the summer of 1868, two of the Younger Brothers, Coleman and John, were in Sedalia, Missouri. While there they chanced to meet upon the public road a man by the name of Consollas, who lived near Brownington, Henry county, Missouri. While in Sedalia, Consollas bantered the Younger boys for a game of cards, but they declined, stating that they seldom indulged in that kind of amusement, and when they did, it was simply for amusement, and not for money. Consollas kept at them to play, and Cole told him if nothing else would do him, he would play him a few games of draw poker. After playing a short time Consollas' money began rapidly to pass from his possession into that of Younger's. After playing several hours Younger won all the money he had, $150. When the old man discovered that his money was all gone he began to get a little crusty and told Younger he believed he stole cards. "I did not," replied Younger. The old man replied, "I'll be d—d if you didn't." "You are mistaken," replied Cole Younger, "it was a fair game, but luck was against you, that is all. A man can't be in luck all the time." "Well," replied Consollas, "you have got my last dollar." "How far are you from home?" asked Younger. "Fifty miles," replied Consollas. "Well," replied Younger, "I will give you money enough to take you back to the old woman." "By G—d, I don't want to see the old woman in my fix; not a dollar in my pocket," replied the old man. "Well, I will give you a chance to win back your money," said Younger, "if you will get a stake from some of your friends.", "What would be the use, d—n you, you would steal that, too." The language of the old man then got a little too insulting for Cole, and he slapped him in the face, and stepped out of the room.

A week or two after the above occurrence Cole Younger and two of his brothers, James and John, in company with a few friends, who had their families with them, started to move to Texas, his friends and their families stopping a few days at the Monegaw Springs, St. Clair county. Cole Younger and his brothers were yet in Lafayette county, but in a few days passed on down to Monegaw Springs. They passed through Clinton and Brownington, Henry county, on the road to the Monegaw Springs, close by the house of Consollas, where he kept store. Consollas recognized Cole Younger, and as soon as he and his brothers passed, Consollas set about to concoct some plan by which he could wreak vengeance upon him for the loss of his money as well as the slapping of his face. He had a large pasture, part prairie and part timber, and at once jumped upon a horse and went to his neighbors and told them that a certain gray horse was stolen out of the pasture, and from where the fence was thrown down, as from the traces he could see, he believed the thief had gone to Monegaw Springs. By these false representations he induced some ten or fifteen of his neighbors to accompany him to the Springs, he leading the party, well knowing who it was he wanted. Seeing them pass, and knowing the direction they took, he was not long in getting on the trail of the Younger Brothers, who had got with and met their moving friends at Monegaw Springs, according to promise. This was about the first of September, 1868. The weather was warm, and a great many persons were at the Springs, partaking of those healing waters, as well as enjoying the delightful breeze. Consollas and his party came upon the ground heavily armed with shot-guns and revolvers, seemingly on the war trail. Cole Younger eyed them closely and soon recognized the man he had won $150 of in Sedalia, and at once came to the conclusion that the old fellow was after nothing good. He watched him closely. Finally, Consollas and party moved about among the campers and told them of his having had a gray horse stolen in Henry county, and he believed them fellers, pointing to Cole Younger and his brothers, were the guilty parties, and asked them if they would assist to arrest them. Some of the men talked to, knew Cole Younger and his brothers, and they at once notified them of the business of the armed men. When Consollas was asked if his horse was upon the ground, he replied no, they had sold him. After learning these facts, Cole and his brothers, not desiring to have any difficulty, quietly mounted their horses and rode over the creek until they got out of sight of the armed mob, when they halted and grazed their horses. After the mob found that the Youngers had friends there, who did not believe them guilty of stealing horses, and finding that they were gone, they returned to their homes. It was afterwards proven that the old man had not lost a horse, and that his animal was in the pasture at that very time. After his neighbors who were fooled into the pretended hunt for horse thieves learned the facts in the case, they talked strongly of taking the old man out and flogging him. This circumstance is but one among many which have been gotten up to prejudice the public mind against the Youngers.

JAMES H. YOUNGER.

James H. Younger is near 29 years of age. He joined the forces of Quantrell in the year 1863, sometime after Coleman, and the cause of him doing so, was owing to the treatment his father and mother had received at the hands of the Jayhawkers, as well as the treatment he received at their hands on several occasions, although a mere boy. He is a young man of limited education, never having had an opportunity to avail himself of the means of getting one, owing to the troubled condition of the country, the bad feeling that existed shortly after the war, and to the fact that almost immediately on his return home after the war, he was compelled to move from place to place to prevent his personal enemies from taking his life. He was also kept in the military prison, in Kentucky, for about six months after the surrender of the Confederate forces.

During the war he figured less conspicuously than did his elder brother, Coleman, although we have been able to gather a few instances in which he showed great bravery and performed some almost miraculous feats.

A NARROW ESCAPE IN KANSAS CITY.

In the summer of 1863, James Younger and four of his comrades went to Kansas City one night, which place was then held by the Federals. They rode their horses, managing to evade the pickets. After entering the city and hitching their horses in a back alley, they promenaded over town for some time, until finally the police found them out and gave them chase. They at once made for the bank of the river, hoping to find a skiff and make their escape across the river, for they at once saw plainly that they were cut off from their horses. James Younger was pressed so closely that he was compelled to run through an alley, thus cutting him off from the rest of the men. He continued his flight in the direction of the river, which point he gained in safety, but not finding a skiff, and hearing the near approach of his pursuers, had no time to conjecture or plan for escape, but at once jumped into the river with all of his clothes on, hoping to gain a sand bar in the river, distant about 300 yards. He had often seen this bar in the days of peace, long before war had cursed the land of his birth. He landed upon the bar in safety, where some driftwood had lodged. While swimming to the bar the policemen had sent bullets after him, but without taking effect. While pulling off his clothes preparatory to swimming across the river, he saw a steamboat coming up, and waited until it passed him. As it passed he concealed himself as best he could. The boat ran so close to him that the light from it lit up the bar upon which he was very brightly. As soon as it had passed and the dark mantle of night was again thrown over all around him, he pulled off his clothes and set out for the opposite shore, which he reached in safety. Believing that all of his comrades were on that side of the river, and feeling greatly exhausted, he at once commenced hooting like an owl, a very common practice with Quantrell's men when out at night and wishing to find one another. This hoot was soon answered by four others, when he at once knew that his companions were near him. They were now in

Clay county, Missouri, and he was naked, on foot and without arms. He at once climbed up the bank and hooted again, which was answered, and he and his companions were soon together again. After detailing to one another their escape, &c., James said to the others, "Boys, I must have a suit of clothes." "Well," replied James, "Liberty has got plenty in it." "Yes," one replied, "but how are you going to get there." "That don't make any difference," said James, "I must have them, and will. We have all lost our horses and must have a complete cavalry outfit to-night, and be upon the other side of the river before day lights up the Eastern horizon." "Well, that is the right kind of talk," was the reply. "Now, boys, we must get all we want from the Federals at Liberty," said Younger. "When we get within one mile of town we will leave the main road. By so doing we will miss the pickets. We will then follow the by-roads and paths until we get near the camp guard, if they chance to have any out, but as it is a rainy night, they may not have any. Should they have them posted around the camp, we will skylight them or find their whereabouts, somehow." So on they went until they could discern the town through the darkness, by the white houses. Here they turned to the left and went into town in the rear. As they cautiously approached the camp James Younger stopped. He had seen a guard between him and a smoldering light. He then told his companions to squat down, and he would see where the next sentinel was placed upon post. Younger soon returned with the information that there was one other guard on that side of the town, and said he felt sure they could pass between the two, and if they could, they were all right, as it was now about one or two o'clock, and he thought the entire camp was asleep. Younger led the way to a small ditch, which run back from an alley, up this ditch and through the alley they went, passing the guards unobserved, and entering the Federal camp. Everything was as still as death—none were awake. There was no time to be lost. Younger soon got himself a suit of clothes. The next thing they needed was horses and equipments. They then went to where the horses were tied, selected the best ones they could find, procured saddles and bridles, put them on, and all was now ready to mount and leave, when Younger happened to think that he had no arms. He concluded that he would yet secure a couple of good revolvers, and at once crawled among the sleeping soldiers to secure pistols. This was soon done. After buckling on the revolvers he returned to his companions, who were waiting for him, when they mounted the horses and started to ride off. As they did so the cry sounded in their ears, "thieves in camp." It was now time to be getting away, and they put spurs to their horses and left on a double quick, making their way out about the same way they went in, running over the first picket they discovered going in, who was asleep, and made their way out in safety. The next thing was to cross the Missouri river before day. They arrived upon the river bank just as day was breaking, at an old crossing below Independence, where they plunged their horses into the river and swam safely over to the opposite shore, just as the lark had commenced to warble his morning notes.

CAPTURED IN KENTUCKY.

In the fall of 1864 James Younger accompanied Quantrell to Kentucky, the latter intending to go to his old home in Maryland. Quantrell then passed himself and his men off as Federals, drawing rations from the Federal officers at Louisville. One day, however, one of his men got drunk and yelled out in a loud voice for Quantrell, which at once aroused suspicion, and Quantrell learning the fact, drew his men off and a fight soon commenced, Quantrell cutting the telegraph wires and cutting up Jack generally. This discovery created much commotion in Federal circles throughout the State of Kentucky, the Federal officers scarcely knew what to do. During the battle with Quantrell and his men, in which the former was killed, or at least mortally wounded, James Younger was taken prisoner and sent to the Alton, Illinois, Military' prison, remaining there until the summer of 1866, when he was released and returned home to Jackson county, Missouri, the home of his mother, where he and the other boys commenced to make rails and improve the farm, nearly everything having been destroyed during the war. But he was not long allowed to remain home in peace, as the Jayhawkers were continually visiting the home of their mother, in the hope of capturing Cole and James, the two oldest, who had been with Quantrell.

JOHN YOUNGER.

John Younger was 24 years of age at the time of his death.

John Younger, in 1865, in Independence, Mo., shot and killed a man. He was arrested and tried by the authorities and acquitted on the ground of self-defence, he being only 15 years of age at the time:

The nerve of the Youngers under circumstances the most disadvantageous, is one of their peculiar traits. They seem not to know what it is to be overpowered. No better illustration of the character of the Youngers need be cited than the shooting of John Younger by Capt. Lull, one of Pinkerton's Chicago detectives, in March, 1874, near Monegaw Springs, St. Clair county, Missouri. John Younger was sitting on his horse at the time, with his gun resting on the pommel of his saddle. Lull watched his opportunity, drew his revolver and shot John Younger full in the throat, tearing open the jugular vein. With the life-blood pouring in a great gushing stream, Younger actually straightened himself in his saddle, threw forward his gun, and, with deliberate aim, poured a heavy load of buckshot into Capt. Lull's chest and left arm, and then dropped his gun and drew his revolver, which he emptied into the body of Lull and Ed. Daniels, before he fell from his horse. With truth it may be said that there are few instances of like character on record.

But this was not the first time that John Younger had shown that strange characteristic of the genuine border desperado; the almost superhuman faculty of looking unflinchingly into the face of death, and struggling up from a blow which would have crushed 999 men out of every 1,000, to inflict a mortal wound upon his slayer. He was not out of his teens when the war closed. The mother, broken down by the unceasing persecutions of the Jayhawkers, had gathered her children about her on the farm they had been forced to abandon in Jackson county at the outbreak of the war. John Younger had returned, and Cole and Jim, the eldest brothers, were supposed to have come back also. It was asking too much of human nature to think the memories of the border atrocities could be wiped out by the surrender at Appomattox.

THE JAYHAWKERS HANG JOHN UP.

One night a band of Jayhawkers swooped down on the farm house, broke in the doors and windows, and, with ready revolvers in hand, sprang in to wipe out a long score with the Guerrillas. They found only the poor woman dying with consumption, her children about her. Disappointed at not meeting the older brothers, they took John Younger to the barn. They had reason to believe that Cole and Jim were still in the vicinity. A rope was thrown over a beam, the noose put around the boy's neck, and he was told that only by revealing the hiding place of his brothers could he save his life. Three times he was strung up until almost dead, then lowered and resuscitated, but only refused to give the desired information. The fourth time the furious band left him dangling in the air until the rope had cut through the skin and buried itself in the boy's neck. When the rope was lowered he lay limp and lifeless on the stable-floor without perceptible respiration. It was half an hour before consciousness began to return, and when, weak and panting, their victim was unable to stand, the fiends wounded him with their sabres, forced him to accompany them, accelerating his speed from time to time by striking him upon the shoulders with the butts of their muskets. The next morning he crawled back home half dead, to find his mother's end hastened by the agonizing suspense of the night. Soon after that the mother of the Youngers died, and the boys become wanderers without a local habitation beyond the wild cattle ranches of Western Texas. Much of their time was spent on the cattle trail from the Mexican border to Missouri.

KILLING OF THE SHERIFF AT DALLAS, TEXAS.

About the first of January, 1871, John Younger stopped for a short time in Dallas, Texas, and was engaged in clerking in a store. While there he met an old Missourian, named Nichols, who was then sheriff of the county. Nichols had been a Colonel in the Confederate army. Several accounts have been published in newspapers of the origin and termination of the difficulty he had there, but we are informed on reliable authority that the accounts thus published were incorrect, in the main facts, in regard to the case, and we shall proceed to give the true version of the difficulty, as we learn it from one who was a friend to both parties.

One night John Younger and a friend were in a saloon, and all had been indulging pretty freely, and joking and sport was carried on to a considerable extent. There was in the saloon at the time an old codger who was generally regarded as a fool, and with whom almost everybody took greater or less liberty. After some joking with him, John Younger told him to stand still and he would show him how close he could shoot to his nose without hitting it. John Younger then drew his revolver and fired several shots, each time the ball passing very close to the old man's nose. At length Younger put up his revolver and let the old man alone, as he observed that he seemed very much frightened.

Some of the crowd then got around the old man and made him believe that Younger was trying to kill him, and advised him to go and swear out a States warrant for Younger. The old man finally left the saloon and actually did go and swear out a warrant for the arrest of Younger. After remaining in the saloon for some time Younger went to the hotel and then to bed. As before stated, a warrant was issued that night and placed in the hands of the Sheriff, who went to the hotel early the next morning in search of Younger, and found him in bed. He told Younger that he had a warrant for his arrest, when Younger replied, "All right; give me time to get my breakfast, and I will report at your office in an hour." The Youngers were well known, all along the border, at that time, and the Sheriff, apparently acquiesced in the arrangement and went off.

Younger calmly and coolly dressed himself, ate his breakfast, and walked to the stable to look at his horse. A guard stood at the stable-door and refused him entrance. Infuriated at the apparent want of faith on the part of the Sheriff, Younger turned on his heel and strode into the Sheriff's office. An armed man stood at the door, and as Younger pushed in, another man, with a gun between his knees, grudgingly made room for him. Walking straight up to the Sheriff, Younger said: "You have not treated me right, Colonel." The Sheriff replied stiffly and drew his revolver. Younger at once followed the movement, and simultaneously came the fire. The Sheriff dropped dying, shot through the chest. Younger stepped back, and, as he did so, the man at the door raised his gun and poured a double charge of buckshot in Younger's left arm and shoulder, tearing the flesh into shreds. So close was the range that the flash of the powder cauterized the wound, in a measure. Younger went down under the fearful shock, but in a moment struggled to his feet, and, putting his revolver to the man's breast, shot him dead.

aiming for Red River, which place he reached by sunrise the next morning, a distance of 80 miles. After reaching the north bank of the river, the Sheriff's party arrived on the opposite bank, in pursuit of Younger, when some shots were exchanged between the parties, two of the Sheriff's party being wounded. The Sheriff's party then retraced their steps. Younger and his friend took breakfast at the house of a friend near by. Here Younger had his wounds dressed for the first time. After breakfast and his wounds were dressed, he left for St. Clair county, Missouri, where he stopped with a friend, near Chalk Level, until about the first of June, 1871, when he went to Kansas City, took the cars for California, and in a few days reached the house of his uncle. He was not satisfied here, and after remaining but a few months, he started back to the States, by rail. After the train left a station 200 miles west of Denver, Colorado, he jumped off the cars. His jumping off was caused by a couple of Detectives getting on the cars at this station, and after sitting a moment, eyed Younger, as he supposed, and then told him to surrender, at the same time drawing a pistol. Younger then drew his pistol, and shot the Detective who spoke, and then jumped out of the window. As was afterwards learned, the Detective was not after Younger, but the man who was in the seat with him. Younger, after jumping from the train, made for the mountains. He was then 200 miles from Denver, amid the lofty peaks of the Rocky Mountains. He then steered his course the best he could in the direction of Denver City, and finally arrived at a friendly habitation, upon one of the small tributaries at the head of the Green River. By this time he was worn out by fatigue and exhaustion, his feet one blister. He was now 75 miles from Denver. Here he hired a ranchman to convey him on horseback to Denver City, for which conveyance he paid him $75, which took nearly all the money he had. He staid there but a few days, and when some teams were starting for Kansas, he succeeded in getting with them as teamster simply for his board. After getting into the interior of Kansas he left the teams and started across the country on foot, aiming to get to Independence, Mo., where he arrived at his uncle's, Dr. Twyman, who lives near Blue Mills, Jackson county, completely worn out. Not being accustomed to walking, the trip was very hard on him, as he was but 19 years of age, though he had seen much trouble and knew how to endure it.

From the name the Youngers have, the reader would suppose he would have stolen at least a mustang pony, but such was not the case. After returning from this trip, he was asked why he did not steal a pony, and he replied that he never wanted the name of a horse thief; our names are bad enough now, and I never want the name of horse thief added—I was raised by honest and pious parents and could not think of disgracing their untimely ashes by such an act. The cry against me and my brothers is false to a great extent, and for what we are guilty, rests upon other shoulders. (He refers to the death of his parents, and says they cry us down to have us murdered.) My life has never been any satisfaction to me, but has been but one continued series of troubles, etc. If I thought I would have to endure as much trouble as I have done in the next ten years I would rather die now. Money caused the death of Pa, and now the rascals of the country, to get money, are robbing bank after bank, and all is laid to the Youngers. One may be robbed in Denver to-day and one in Louisville, Ky., and both will be charged to the Youngers.

ROBERT EWING YOUNGER.

Robert Younger is the youngest of the boys, being now only 22 years of age. He was too young to take part in the late war, but, as he grew up to manhood and learned and saw the brutal treatment of his father and mother, necessarily became revengeful and entertained but little love for those who took part in it, or in any way sympathized with those who were participants in these outrages. We have but little of his life, singly, though much in connection with one or more of his brothers, which will be found under appropriate headings.

JOHN AND ROBERT E. YOUNGER.

CHARGED WITH STEALING HORSES.

About the first of December, 1873, a horse was stolen in Clay county, Missouri, and a certain man in the neighborhood who did not like the Youngers, at once accused the boys of taking the horse. He at length succeeded in making the loser of the animal believe that it could be found in St. Clair county, and asked that a party of men accompany him to where, he believed, the horse could be recovered. As the sequel afterwards proved, a party accompanied him as far as Appleton City, in St. Clair county, where additional recruits were added, when the whole party proceeded to the vicinity of Monegaw Springs, in St. Clair county, Missouri, the neighborhood in which the Youngers usually resort when in that section of country. A man by the name of Morrow was about to mount his horse and ride to a neighbor's, when he discovered a party of armed men coming towards him. Mr. Morrow become somewhat alarmed at the sight of armed men, not knowing what it meant, and proceeded to mount his horse. Seeing the movements of Mr. Morrow, and by this time being nearly in gun-shot range, the approaching mob called to him to halt, at the same time quickening their speed. Mr. Morrow owned a very fine horse, and, as was afterwards learned, it answered, at a distance, very well the description of the one stolen in Clay county. As soon as Mr. Morrow was commanded to "halt," he put spurs to his horse and rode rapidly away. He was pursued, but his pursuers were soon left far in the rear. John and Robert Younger happened to be in the neighborhood at the time, and a friend of theirs chanced to meet the armed mob, who inquired of him for certain ones of the Youngers, at the same time stating that one of the Youngers was riding a horse that had been stolen in Clay county, Missouri, and, further, that they were out on the hunt for the Youngers. Learning that a party was in search of them, the Youngers started on the war trail, in search of the hunting party. The six doubly armed men extended their search as far as Roscoe, also in St. Clair county, which place they reached on the morning of the 8th of December, 1873. They next scoured the Osage hills, going in the direction of Chalk Level, which lies northwest of the Monegaw Springs, but after traveling the Chalk Level road some three miles, four of the party filed to the left, in the direction of Monegaw Springs. The Younger boys being in search of the hunting party all this time, at length came upon and captured the four at Monegaw Springs.

THEY DISARM THEIR PURSUERS.

The Youngers, after disarming their prisoners, took them to the Monegaw Hotel and had a good breakfast prepared for them, but the poor fellows had lost their appetites, and all, save one, ate sparingly, while he, poor creature, could not eat anything—he was sick—sick at heart, and longed to be with his wife and children. After breakfast was over Robert Younger formed the prisoners in line and made them a speech, the substance of which was as follows:

SPEECH OF ROBERT YOUNGER.

“Now, gentlemen, we have you in our power, and can do with you as we wish, and I feel satisfied that were our positions changed, were we at your mercy, beyond a doubt you would kill both of us. But we are men—men possessing too much brave blood to be guilty of such cruel and cowardly butchery. There were and still are certain parties whose political views differed from ours at the breaking out of the late war, and certain men of the opposite party murdered and robbed our old father, who was a Union man, and a peaceable and quiet citizen, all for the sake of a few hundred dollars. The most damnable act of all, however, was the stripping of our widowed mother of all her stock and provision of every kind, and compelling her to fire her own house with her own hands, destroying all the clothing of herself and little children, and thus turning her out, penniless, and without sufficient clothing, upon the cold charities of the world, during the cold blasts of winter, the snow at the time six inches deep on the ground. She was thus compelled to call upon friends and strangers for assistance—for clothing sufficient to keep herself and children from freezing. She was afterwards driven from place to place, and finally brought to an untimely grave, caused by exposure and the wretched and inhuman treatment she received at the hands of Jayhawkers and Home Guards, under the sanction of the Federal authorities. Humanity shudders at the thought. What think you, gentlemen, must be our feelings when reflecting over these things? Some of you, if not all, are members of that same political party which perpetrated these hellish acts of cruelty, not only on our father and mother, but on hundreds of others. And you, sirs, are still trying to implicate me and my brothers in every species of rascality and crime committed in Missouri, and also in other States.

“Now, gentlemen, we set you at liberty; go to your homes and stay there. We want to stay the hand of blood, if possible, and live in peace, but if we can't be permitted to live as peaceable citizens, the blame will rest upon other men's shoulders, not upon ours. You know that my brother Cole was accused of being one of the party who robbed the Iowa railroad train, which occurred July 21st, 1873. At that time, I and my brother Cole were in St. Clair county, Missouri, at these very Springs, probably in this very hotel. The robbery was committed on Monday morning, and on Sunday morning we were down in the bottom and attended preaching. This we can prove by some of the best citizens of the county, and by the minister who preached, Rev. Mr. Smith, of Greenton Valley Church, Lafayette county, Missouri, who was here at the time on a visit. After it was discovered that we could prove this charge false, then we were accused of being horse thieves, and it was insisted that we had been stealing horses. We can prove a good title to every horse we have had since the war, and yet the damn fool party who differs with us politically, has called upon Governor Woodson, of Missouri, to hunt us out of St. Clair county, and the State, as though we were a band of thieves and robbers. But I do hope that Governor Woodson possesses too much good sense and intelligence to believe the Radical lies told by men whose hands are still red with the blood of our dear old father, who was so brutally murdered. These scoundrels endeavor to cover up their own damnable acts by shouting 'murder' and 'thief,' at the backs of other people. And why? They would rejoice at the destruction of myself and brothers, simply because they fear vengeance at our hands, a just retribution. We disclaim any such intention. All we ask, all we pray for, is to be left alone, to be allowed to enjoy ourselves in peace, and follow some useful and honorable avocation. The war has long since ceased, and as we know and believe there is a just God, who will punish all wrong-doers, with him we are willing to let the matter rest.

"Now mount your horses, gentlemen, and go back to Appleton City, and stay there. We don't want to hurt any of you, and do not, by your rashness and folly, compel us to kill any of you, for the task is an unpleasant one; but, as sure as there is a God in Heaven, if we will not be allowed to live in peace, we are ready to sell our lives as dearly as possible. We wish you a safe and pleasant journey home, but under no circumstances must you come back."

At the conclusion of the speech of Robert Younger, both the Youngers shook hands with the party, thus proving to them that they bore no ill-will towards them. The hunting party started out to capture the Youngers, dead or alive, if they could overhaul them, and their friends were confident that such would be the case. Their astonishment can be better imagined than described when they returned and the fact became known that the Youngers had captured them, and the kind treatment they had received at the hands of their captors. This circumstance did much to allay the feeling that many had previously entertained towards the Youngers.

JAMES H. AND JOHN YOUNGER.

PURSUED BY SOLDIERS.

In July, 1873, after the Iowa railroad robbery, some of the Younger boys having been charged with participation in the affair, an armed posse from Iowa and elsewhere arrived at Appleton City, St. Clair county, Mo., and immediately went to work to procure additional recruits to go to Monégaw Springs to capture the Young-

ers. By the time the party started in pursuit their number tallied about forty men, all well armed, and supposed to be brave and determined men, who knew no fear, and all that was necessary was merely to see a Younger, and he was sure to be their prisoner, dead or alive. The party divided into squads of ten each, and commenced scouring the country in search of somebody, they scarcely knew who, but as the Youngers had a bad name, they were sure to suffer if any of them could be found. The whole pretext for all this parade of armed men in St. Clair county, was caused by the fact of some newspaper having asserted that it was believed that some of the Younger boys had a hand in the affair, as they were known to be brave and resolute men, fearing no danger.

Jim and John Younger were in the neighborhood of the Springs at the time, and learning that a party of soldiers, as they had been termed, were on the hunt for them, at once mounted their horses and went to search for the soldiers. They finally overhauled seven of them in the road, and after halting them, inquired of them if they were on the hunt for Youngers. To this inquiry one of the men replied, "We are on the hunt for certain ones of the Youngers." On being told that they (Jim and John) represented the whole family, and that their names were those they wanted, and that they, the soldiers, should take them, the Youngers, if they could, the whole seven heavily armed soldiers commenced scattering through the timber in every direction. The Youngers are dead shots, and could have killed every one of them had they so desired. John Brown and his party, part of this same gang, went to the house of an old black man living near Monegaw Springs, and seeing a black mare in the lot near the house, which, at a distance, answered the description of the horse they were told Cole Younger rode, attempted to take it, whereupon the old black woman made war upon them and drove them out of the lot, asking them if they did not know a mare from a horse.

AGAIN PURSUED TO ST. CLAIR COUNTY.

About the first of March, a train on the Iron Mountain Railroad was flagged and robbed, and in a day or two afterwards detectives were sent to St. Clair county, Missouri, where the Youngers were staying, to hunt them up and implicate them in the affair, as it was known that James and John were then staying in St. Clair county. One of the Detectives, who went by the name of Wright, but whose real name is Boyle, a native of Maryland, and who had been in the Confederate army during the war, remained in and around Osceola for a week or ten days previous to the raid upon the Youngers. Boyle, alias Wright, told the author of this book himself that he had been with the Youngers, James and John, but a day or two previous, at Chalk Level, distant from Monegaw Springs five miles. The termination of the affair proved that Wright was not alone in this matter, but that one of Pinkerton's Chicago Detectives, and one of his very best, shrewdest and bravest men, was also in the county, who went by the name of Allen, but whose real name was Lull. During the stay of Wright in Osceola he made the acquaintance of a young man of the town named Edwin B. Daniels, who sometimes acted as Deputy Sheriff, a man of considerable nerve and courage, highly respected in the county, and who, as it afterwards became known, acted as a guide, and probably agreed to help capture the Youngers, he being well acquainted with them, and was, doubtless, promised a liberal share of the reward offered for their capture.

On Monday morning, the 15th of March, 1874, Daniels and Wright left Osceola for Roscoe, as they stated, to look after cattle. Allen joined them somewhere, or probably left Osceola with them. After reaching Roscoe, twelve miles distant, in St. Clair county, the three men whiled away the remainder of the day and night in the town, staying all night in the Roscoe House. Early the next morning, after breakfast, they all left Roscoe and went in the direction of Chalk Level, the road to which passes the house of Mr. Theodrick Snuffer, one of the oldest residents in the county, having lived where he now resides about forty years, and whose character and standing in the community is beyond reproach. Mr. Snuffer is a distant relative of the Youngers, and whether the boys are guilty of any crimes or not, old man Snuffer does not believe so, but thinks that their persecution grew out of the fact that they were what is generally called "Rebels." Very frequently when the boys are in the county they stop a day or night with the old gentleman, who is very old and feeble. Wright, being a Marylander, and knowing Mr. L. H. Brown, residing on the Chalk Level and Roscoe road, about one mile from Roscoe, stopped to converse with him, while Daniels and Allen went on. Wright did not overtake Allen and Daniels until they had passed the house of Mr. Snuffer, which is three miles north of Roscoe.

Allen and Wright stopped at the fence in front of Mr. Snuffer's house, made inquiry about the road to the widow Sims' house and had some little conversation with old man Snuffer, after which they rode on, but did not take the road they were directed to travel. James and John Younger were in Mr. Snuffer's house at the time eating dinner. The movements of the two men were closely watched by both the Youngers, without being discovered, and when it was observed that they did not take the road they were directed to travel, and noticing that Allen and his horse were strangers in the county, the suspicions of the Youngers were at once aroused and a consultation was had.

THE FIGHT WITH DETECTIVES.

At length they both agreed that the men were detectives, and on the hunt for them, so they determined to mount their horses and follow them, and, if possible, ascertain who they were and what their business was. After Allen and Daniels had passed the house about two or three hundred yards, they were joined by Wright, who, by this time, had overtaken them. We have not been able to ascertain, definitely, where Daniels and the two detectives were about one hour, after passing the house of Mr.

Snuffer, as about that time elapsed before the Youngers met them and the fight commenced, but the circumstances go to show that they were at a negro cabin, near by, probably trying to get some information about the Youngers.

The first news received in Osceola of the fight, was brought by Wright, who said he managed to escape, but thought that Allen and Daniels had both been killed. The story of Wright, as related to us at the time, agrees with that of Allen up to the time Wright left, with the exception that he, Wright, says he was behind Allen and Daniels, instead of in front, as Allen says in his testimony before the Coroner's Jury. At the time we interviewed Allen at Roscoe, we mentioned the fact to him that Wright had stated to us that he, Wright, was behind when fired on, and asked him, Allen, if he might not be mistaken in this matter, as in every particular their testimony agreed, up to the time Wright left, with that exception. Allen, after studying a moment, said he might be mistaken. The following is the statement of Mr. Allen, before the Coroner's inquest :

KILLING OF JOHN YOUNGER AND ED. DANIELS.

W. J. Allen, being duly sworn, testified as follows: Yesterday about half-past two o'clock, the 16th of March, 1874, E. B. Daniels and myself were riding along the road from Roscoe to Chalk Level, which road runs past the house of one Theodrick Snuffer, and about three miles from the town of Roscoe, and in St. Clair county, Missouri, Daniels and myself were riding side by side, and Wright a short distance ahead of us; some noise behind us attracted our attention, and we looked back and saw two men on horseback coming towards us, and one was armed with a double-barrel shotgun, the other with revolvers; don't know if the other had a shot-gun or not; the one had the shotgun cocked, both barrels, and ordered us to halt; Wright drew his pistol and put spurs to his horse and rode off; they ordered him to halt, and shot at him and shot off his hat, but he kept on riding. Daniels and myself stopped, standing across the road on our horses; they rode up to us, and ordered us to take off our pistols and drop them in the road, the one with the gun covering me all the time with the gun. We dropped our pistols on the ground, and one of the men told the other to follow Wright and bring him back, but he refused to go, saying he would stay with him; one of the men picked up the revolvers we had dropped, and looking at them, remarked they were damn fine pistols, and they must make them a present of them; one of them asked me where we came from, and I said Osceola; he then wanted to know what we were doing in this part of the country; I replied, rambling around. One of them then said, you were up here one day before; I replied that we were not; he then said we had been at the Springs; I replied, we had been at the Springs, but had not been inquiring for them, that we did not know them, and they said detectives had been up there hunting for them all the time, and they were going to stop it. Daniels then said, I am no detective; I can show you who I am and where I belong; and one of them said he knew him, and then turned to me and said, what in the hell are you riding around here with all them pistols on for? and I said, good God! is not every man wearing them that is traveling, and have I not as much right to wear them as any one else? and the one that had the shot-gun said, hold on, young man, we don't want any of that, and then lowered the gun, cocked, in a threatening manner; then Daniels had some talk with them, and one of them got off his horse and picked up the pistols; two of them were mine and one was Daniels'; the one mounted had the gun drawn on me, and I concluded that they intended to kill us. I reached my hand behind me and drew a No. 2 Smith & Wesson pistol and cocked it and fired at the one on horseback, and my horse frightened at the report of the pistol and turned to run, and I heard two shots and my left arm fell, and then I had no control over my horse, and he jumped into the bushes and the trees checked his speed, and I tried to get hold of the rein with my right hand, to bring him into the road; one of the men rode by me and fired two shots at me, one of which took effect in my left side, and I lost all control of my horse and he turned into the brush, and a small tree struck me and knocked me out of the saddle. I then got up and staggered across the road and lay down until I was found. No one else was present.

JAMES ST. CLAIR.

James Younger, however, gives quite a different version of the commencement of the shooting, as told by him to old man Snuffer, a few moments afterwards, and also the same evening, to an intimate friend of his, who happened to fall in with him before he, James Younger, left the country. James says that after leaving the house of Mr. Snuffer they took the near cut, coming out on the Chalk Level road about half a mile from the house, and as they came to a turn in the road they met the three men, apparently coming down from the negro house. He says they were about passing them, and had "bid them the time of the day," when the man on the white horse, which was Allen, drew his revolver and shot John Younger in the neck, and that immediately afterwards Daniels drew his revolver and fired at him, Jim Younger, and that he threw himself on the right side of his horse to avoid the shot taking effect in his body, and that in so doing he fell from his horse, and that his horse became frightened and got away from him. Jim Younger also asserts that John fired at the man on the white horse with his double-barrel shotgun as soon as Allen shot him, and then drew his revolver, dropping the gun, and shot Ed. Daniels, and then went in pursuit of Allen, who was fleeing through the timber, shooting him, Allen, several times, until he, John Younger, fell dead from his horse.

The following additional evidence was taken at the coroner's inquest:

"I heard a shot a couple of hundred yards from my house, and I found out after the first shot that it was John and James Younger; after the first shot they ceased firing for some time, and then commenced again, but I had not seen any of the parties; but after several shots had been fired, another man, who I did not know, come down the road, and I think they were both shooting at one another; I am certain that John Younger was shooting at the other man; he continued to run down the road east of here; I think Younger passed the man on the gray horse; about the time John Younger passed him I saw him sink on his horse, as if going to fall; don't know what become of him afterwards; then Younger turned to come west and began to sink, and then fell off his horse; then James Younger come down by here on foot, to where John Younger was lying, and the horse that John Younger was riding, and that was the last I saw of James Younger.

The testimony of John R. McFarren was corroborative of that of John McFarren, both of whom were together.

Two men came to my house and inquired the way to Mrs. Sims'; the third man came along afterwards and overtook them; the two Youngers, John and James, after they had passed, followed them; I saw James Younger after the fight; he told me that John Younger was dead; that they had killed one of the men and that one other had been wounded, Allen; that Allen had a pistol secreted and fired the first shot.

John Younger fell from his horse; James Younger came running up to where John had fallen and called me to him; he then turned him (John Younger) over and took some revolvers off of him and a watch and something else out of his pockets; I do not know what else; I saw John Younger and another man shooting at each other, when the first firing commenced; I think James Younger took four revolvers off of John Younger, his brother; he threw one over the fence and told me to keep it; he then told me to catch a horse and go down and tell Snuffer's folks.

All we know concerning the death of the two men, being the same that the inquest is being held over, is that the one, John Younger, come to his death from the effects of a gun-shot wound, which entered the right side of his neck, touching the clavical bone, on the upper side, and about two inches from the meridian, went nearly straight through the neck; the orifice is small, indicating that he was shot with a small ball. The other man, Edwin B. Daniels, came to his death from the effects of a gunshot wound, which entered the left side of the neck, about one inch from the meridian line, and about midway of the neck, opposite the œsophagus, and as per examination, went nearly straight through the neck, striking the bone ; the orifice was pretty large, indicating that the ball was of a pretty large size.

The following names comprise the Coroner's jury, with A. Ray as foreman: A. Ray, G. W. Cox, J. Davis, W. Holmes, R. C. Gill and H. Gleason.

We, the jury, find that John Younger came to his death by a pistol shot, supposed to have been in the hands of W. J. Allen.

A. RAY, Foreman.

We, the jury, find that Ed. B. Daniels came to his death by a pistol shot, supposed to have been fired by the hand of James Younger.

A. RAY, Foreman.

We have given all the evidence procurable in the case, of both parties, in order that the public might judge for themselves and form their own conclusion.

been done by Ed. Daniels. John Younger was buried at a family burying ground, on the Osceola and Chalk Level road, about three miles west of Osceola. The body of Ed. Daniels was taken charge of by friends and brought to Osceola, where it was decently interred, in the Osceola Cemetery, and his remains were followed to their last resting place by almost the entire community, who universally respected the deceased. Capt. Lull, alias Allen, suffered for about six weeks before he died. During his sickness he was at the Roscoe House, Roscoe, where every attention was given him, and he had the best medical attendance in the county, if not in Southwest Missouri, having been attended by Dr. D. C. McNeil, of Osceola, an old and experienced army surgeon. In his last moments he was surrounded by his wife and brother, who came on to Roscoe from Chicago. His remains were placed in a metallic coffin and taken to Chicago, where he was buried with Masonic honors. This sad and fatal occurrence cast a gloom over the entire county, all regretting that the detectives had paid the county a visit, as it was well known to many that both James and John Younger were in the county at the time the railroad train was flagged and robbed.

YOUNGER.

After the fight between the Chicago Detectives, near the farm of Mr. Theodrick Snuffer, St. Clair county, Missouri, and John and James Younger, and John was killed, in March, 1874, James Younger went to Boone county, Arkansas.

In June, 1874, Cole Younger, who was then in Mississippi, Robert being with him, happened to get hold of a newspaper containing an account of the battle and the death of John Younger. Cole and Robert immediately thereafter mounted their horses and struck out through the country for Arkansas, with the hope of finding James in Boone county, at the house of a friend, a place he and they were in the habit of visiting, and learning all the particulars of the fight, the death of John, etc. They at length reached the place of their destination, and were not disappointed in their expectations, as they found James, who narrated to them all the circumstances attending the battle, as well as the death and burial of John.

A NIGHT ATTACK.

After remaining here a few days, one night Cole and Bob went to the house of a neighbor leaving James at the house of their friend. About the break of day the next morning firing was heard in the direction of the house at which James was stopping, which they had left the evening previous. At the time they were at a loss to know the cause, but at once proceeded to mount their horses and ride over to the house, arriving only in time to get a glimpse of the retreating party. It was afterwards learned that some horses had been stolen in the neighborhood a day or two previous, and as some strange men were seen going to the house, suspicion rested upon them in the minds of the citizens, which led to the attack upon the house. James at once became alarmed at seeing a mob around the house at such an early hour in the morning. He slipped up stairs, and going to the window to ascertain, if possible, the cause of the trouble, he was at once fired upon by those in front of the house. He immediately returned the fire, killing one man, and wounding another. After this the mob fled.

ATTACKED WHILE WATERING THEIR HORSES.

The Younger Brothers, after this fracas, mounted their horses and started for the home of a friend, living south of the Arkansas river. On the second day, while watering their horses at a creek, a party of twelve men rode up in sight of them and commenced firing on them. They at once returned the fire. Cole's horse was shot dead under him, but, after dismounting, he kept up a fire on the enemy on foot until the pursuing party fled. None of the boys were wounded in this engagement, although several of the pursuing party were.

ANOTHER ATTACK.

The boys then continued to proceed on towards their destination. Cole purchased a horse the next morning. They crossed the Arkansas River at Roseville, twenty-five miles below Van Buren. After they had crossed the river a short distance, on the Thoroughfare road, they chanced to meet an old Confederate friend of Cole's, on his way to Louisiana. After proceeding on their journey some distance, the party stopped in a ravine, and Jim and Bob went up the ravine to a spring. It seems that horse stealing had been going on in this section also, a few days previous, and the excitement was up to fever heat, and that parties were scouring the country in almost every direction. Cole and his friend were sitting on their horses talking of war times, and waiting for Jim and Robert to return. Cole happened to look back on the road, and he discovered some twenty-five or thirty armed men coming towards them at a rapid rate. About the time he discovered the advancing party they also observed him, and at once commenced increasing the speed of their horses. When they had approached within about one hundred yards, they at once opened fire, which was returned by Cole Younger and his friend, without their knowing the cause. The fight was hotly contested for several moments. Five of the attacking party were killed during the fight and several wounded, but those who were wounded were taken off when they retreated. Cole was shot in the right knee with buckshot, and his horse was also badly wounded. Jim and Bob returned about the time the fight commenced, and took an active part in the engagement, firing on the enemy's right wing. Cole's horse, after being wounded, dashed through the timber, and his head struck against a tree, which blinded him for a moment. Neither of the other Younger's nor Cole's friend were harmed.

After the enemy had retreated, the boys and their friend proceeded on their journey towards the place of their destination. They had not proceeded far, however, before Cole's horse, which had been wounded, gave out, and they were compelled to leave him on the road. Jim then dismounted and gave Cole his horse, walking with the party, until they could purchase another horse, which they succeeded in doing the next day.

THEY RETURN TO MISSOURI.

They then determined to go to Missouri, to the house of a friend, where Cole could have his wound attended to. They recrossed the Arkansas River near Dardanelle, their friend proceeding on his journey to Louisiana. It was then determined to separate, Jim and Bob going one route and Cole another, agreeing to meet in Fulton county, Arkansas, at the house of a friend. The separation was agreed upon under the belief that they might be pursued, and it was thought best for Cole to go alone, in his wounded condition, thus lessening the probability, as they thought, of his being followed. Their surmises proved correct, as the sequel proved.

JAMES AND ROBERT PURSUED.

While Jim and Bob were in the eastern part of Marion county, Arkansas, stopping for dinner, their horses grazing, Jim was lying down on the grass, asleep, while Bob was sitting under the tree whittling, he heard some one sing out, "surrender, you damn thieves," and looking up, saw two men at the yard gate, some forty yards distant, with guns in their hands; one of the men standing directly in front of the gate, while the other was standing a few feet to the right, at the side of a wagon. The call awoke Jim and he sprang to his feet. As he rose both men at the yard fence fired, one of their shots taking effect in the neck of Jim. Almost at the same time Bob fired at the man by the side of the wagon, shooting him through the chest. Seeing other men coming towards the house, Bob and Jim made for the brush, leaving their horses in the pasture. Before reaching the brush they were further pursued and fired upon, another ball striking Jim in the right hip, passing through, and coming out at the lower part of the abdomen. Notwithstanding the two dangerous wounds Jim had received, he continued to flee and finally gained the brush, where they were able to elude their pursuers, who gave up the chase and turned their attention to their dead companion and the captured horses. Shortly after gaining the brush Jim fainted from loss of blood, but his brother Bob helped and urged him on to where they could procure water with which to bathe and dress his wounds.

This single circumstance is one of many which goes to show the pluck and determination of the Youngers, a characteristic of all of them, as none but an extraordinary man could have stood up and traveled about one mile before water was reached. On the route Jim fainted five or six times. After reaching water Bob took the shirt from his person, bathed and dressed the wounds of his brother, and then the two proceeded on their journey during the whole night, being guided by the stars as best they could. About an hour before sunrise the next morning they neared a large farm house, and Bob at once determined to secrete Jim in the brush and endeavor to purchase horses as soon as work was commenced on the farm.

TWO HORSES PRESSED INTO SERVICE.

After the lapse of about one hour, two young men were seen coming into a field to plow. Bob crossed over to where the nearest one to him was, and after bidding him the time of day, asked him if his father was at home, &c., and learning that the old gentleman was out after horsethieves, about six miles distant, the place at which the fight took place the afternoon previous, told the young man that he wanted to buy his mare, (she having a colt,) and that he would give him all she was worth and allow him to keep the colt. The boy said he would see his brother, and the two went over to where the other young man was, and he was made acquainted with the facts and also told that he could sell his horse on the same terms. The boy at once flew into a rage, telling his brother to go to the house and get the gun, and they would shoot the damn thief. Younger insisted that he did not want to steal the horses, but would pay him the money for both, but the boy was not to be argued into selling them, and insisted on his brother going to the house for the gun to shoot the thief. Younger seeing that words and money were of no avail, and considering the helplessness of his brother, determined to have the horses at all hazards, so he drew his pistol and told both boys to unharness the horses and follow him, which they at once proceeded to do. They then went to where Jim was lying, and Bob made the boys help him on one of the horses, and he, Bob, mounted the other. He then again offered the boys pay for the horses, but they refused to take it, when he ordered them to go straight home, and he and Jim got on the main road and proceeded to where they had promised to meet Cole, Bob telling Jim to keep in the lead and he would bring up the rear and protect him, and to make the best time he could, as it was necessary that they should get out of that country as quick as possible.

ANOTHER FIGHT WITH THEIR PURSUERS.

After traveling about fifteen miles a party of armed men overtook them and at once commenced firing. A running fight continued for some time, Bob returning the fire, he having Jim's pistol as well as his own. Bob succeeded in killing one man and wounding another. During the fight Bob felt great anxiety for Jim's safety, and while leaning forward on his horse and urging Jim to retreat as fast as possible, a ball from one of the guns of the pursuing party struck him under the left shoulder blade, coming out on top of the shoulder. The pursuers at length gave up the chase and cared for their dead and wounded. About dusk that evening they arrived at the house of their friend, where they had promised to meet Cole, and they found him there, his wound having greatly improved. All three of the boys were now badly wounded, and they took to the brush, a short distance from the house, where a sort of hospital was erected, and Cole acted as surgeon, dressing the wounds and otherwise caring for the maimed. Cole being less disabled than either of the other boys, that night took both of the mares which had been pressed from the boys in the morning out on the road some fifteen miles and turned them loose, thinking they would return to their homes and colts. As was afterwards learned, they both went straight home.

ANOTHER NIGHT ATTACK.

Horse stealing is a very common thing in that whole region of country, and the neighborhood in which the boys were now stopping had suffered in this line but a day or two previous and parties were then on the hunt for stolen horses and horse-thieves. The second night after their arriving at the house of their friend, who, by the way, had not long resided there, having moved from Missouri, a party on the hunt surrounded the house and used some harsh language towards the occupant, branding all Missourians as horse-thieves, and at length fired into the windows. The occupant of the house at once returned the fire, killing one, and then fled to where the boys were. It was afterwards learned that he had killed one of his nearest neighbors, but, though regretting it, felt conscious that the fault was clearly with the deceased.

Matters again assumed rather too lively an appearance for them, and the boys and their friend left for the residence of an acquaintance in the Choctaw Nation, after procuring horses, the Younger boys being in a very feeble condition. After reaching the Nation they traded a horse for a spring wagon, and then went to Western Texas, remaining there until their wounds were all healed up. They reached Western Texas in the month of July, 1874. Thus it will be seen that for about one month previous to their reaching Western Texas, it was one continued series of engagements with much superior numbers, and during this time a number of men were killed and many wounded, the Younger boys themselves receiving such wounds as but few men could bear up under, much less endure the hardships and privations which fell to their lot.

THE YOUNGERS GENERALLY.

The Youngers went home after the surrender of the Southern Armies, and tried to live at peace with their old neighbors and friends. They were residents of Jackson co souri, and for months it was a question whether this county would be held altogether by the Kansas people, or go back to Missouri. The county was in a state of anarchy. A vigilance committee went one night to the home of the Youngers, surrounded the house, attacked the female members, but found none of the men at home. Again and again this was done. Threats were made of certain death if any of them were caught, and word was sent them that they should not remain in the county. They were waylaid, and hunted down in every conceivable manner. They were compelled to protect themselves in the best possible manner, to go heavily armed, and thus were forced to assume the character of outlaws. Other and bad men took advantage of this condition of affairs to pillage and murder in their names. Every highway robbery in the West, especially if there was about it a deed of boldness and dash, was placed to their account, almost without knowing why, and suddenly these proscribed men were made both famous and infamous.

Propositions were made to both Governors McClurg and Woodson, only asking protection from mob-violence as the sole condition of a surrender. Neither of the Governors gave the required guarantee, and so nothing came of the efforts made, in good faith, to be once more at peace with society and the law. There was abundant reason why these men should not surrender unless the guarantee of protection was given, for men who had served in the same guerrilla band had been taken out at night from their places of imprisonment and hung by masked and unknown men. Tom Little was hung at Warrensburg, Johnson county; McGuire and Devon were hung at Richmond, Ray county; Arch. Clemens was shot in Lexington, Lafayette county; Al. Shepherd and Payne Jones were shot in Jackson county; in the same county Dick Burns was surprised, while asleep, and murdered. Many of Quantrell's men had to flee the country; many were hung and shot in other places. For months after hostilities had ceased, predatory and blood-thirsty bands, under the guise of vigilance committees, swept over the border counties, making quick work of Confederate guerrillas wherever they could be found.

For all crimes committed during the war the Congress of the United States had absolved the Federal soldiers. By a special law, Kansas granted absolution to all who had killed, robbed, burned or plundered, and held the militia free from any trial or prosecution for deeds done or crimes committed during the war. The present Constitution of Missouri provides that no person shall be prosecuted in any civil action or criminal proceeding for, or on account of any act by him done, performed, or executed after January 1st, 1861, by virtue of military authority. Happening to be on the wrong side, however, these men are cut off from the benefits of all such amnesties or protective acts, and are outlaws simply because they were forced into an attitude of resistance in that transition period in Missouri when the very worst element of the population were gratifying their private feuds and vengeance. It has long since been an established fact that the Youngers cannot be taken alive by force, and all hopes of doing so by those who imagine they can capture them, to the mind of every man in the least acquainted with them, is perfectly ridiculous.

The Younger boys have a cattle ranch in Texas, which they call their home. When the semi-annual cattle "drive" comes up, however, it generally brings them back to their old haunts, and the homes of their friends in Missouri, in St. Clair, Jackson and other counties, where they remain a short time, visiting friends and relatives.

Years ago these boys were orphaned and driven out of Missouri, and the continued efforts of their enemies to persecute and hunt them down like wild beasts, has, very naturally, caused them to become reckless and at all times prepared for an emergency. They are men possessing but few of the lesser vices, and it is no uncommon thing to see them attending church, when they are in a neighborhood where there is no likelihood of trouble.

Almost every depredation committed in Missouri and the adjoining States, the past four or five years, has been laid to the Youngers or their friends. In fact, such has been their character, that it seemed an easy matter for others to commit depredations and escape detection. Within the past year, however, this has been discovered to be a great mistake, and since the few, if any, of the crimes committed, have been attributed to the Younger Brothers.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

The Hot Springs, Arkansas, stage robbery, which occurred in January, 1874, was one of the boldest robberies ever committed, eclipsing any of the feats attempted by the renowned Dick Turpin. Cole Younger was charged with having a hand in this little affair, but he is able to prove by some of the leading men of Carroll Parish, Louisiana, that he was there at the time. In his letter, published elsewhere, Cole Younger refers to this matter, and gives the names of gentlemen by whom he can prove his whereabouts at the time. This book being a pretty complete history of Western depredations during the past few years, we reprint the following account of this daring highway robbery, taken from the Little Rock, Arkansas, Gazette:

“From Mr. G. R. Crump, a representative of the wholesale tobacco and cigar house of Edmunds, Pettigrew & Co., of Memphis, who arrived from Hot Springs last night, and was on Thursday’s stage, going to the Springs, at the time of the robbery referred to in Friday’s Gazette, we learn the particulars of the affair. There was one stage and two light road wagons, or ambulances, the stage being in front and the other two vehicles immediately in the rear. At the Gains place, five miles this side of Hot Springs, the stage was stopped to water the stock. While watering, five men rode up, coming from toward Hot Springs, and passed on by. Each man wore a heavy blue army overcoat, but neither of them were masked. Nothing was thought of the matter, and the vehicles moved on. After going about half a mile, the men who had passed them at the Gains place, rode up from behind, and the first thing that Mr. Crump, who was in the first stage, heard, was an order to the driver to stop, or his head would be blown off. The stage was stopped, and, on throwing up the curtain, he saw a pistol pointed at him and the others in the stage, telling them to get out quick, accompanied by an oath. They got out, and as they did so, were ordered to throw up their hands. Three men were in front of them with cocked pistols and another with a shot-gun, while on the other side of the stage was still another, all pointing their weapons toward the passengers and the driver. After getting the passengers out they made them form in a kind of circle, so that all of them could be covered by the pistols and gun.

The leader then "went through" each passenger, taking all the watches, jewelry and money that could conveniently be found that were of special value. From ex-Gov. Burbank, of Dakota, they obtained $840 in money, a diamond pin and gold watch. A gentleman named Taylor, from Lowell, Mass., went up for $650 in money. A passenger from Syracuse, N. Y., gave up his last nickle, $160. Mr. Johnny Dietrich, our boot and shoe merchant, lost $5 in money and a fine gold watch. He had $50 besides this in the watch pocket of his pants which they did not find. Mr. Charley Moore, of the ice house, gave up $70 in money and his silver watch, but they returned the latter, stating they did not want any silver watches. A Mr. Peoples, who resides near Hot Springs, lost $20. Three countrymen lost about $15. The express package, containing about $450, was also taken. Mr. Crump had his watch and about $40 to $45 in money gobbled. After getting through with the passengers, they tore open several mail sacks in search of registered letters, but did not get any. While the main party was engaged in this work, another took out the best horse in the coach, saddled him, rode him up and down the road about fifty yards, two or three times, and remarked that "he would do."

After all this the captain went to each passenger in turn and questioned him as to where he was from, and inquired if there were any Southern men along. Mr. Crump spoke up, as did one or two others, that they were Southern men. They then asked if there were any who had served in the Confederate army during the war. Mr. Crump answered that he did. They questioned him as to what command, and remarking that he looked like an honest fellow, one who was telling the truth, handed him back his watch and money, saying they did not want to rob Confederate soldiers; that the Northern men had driven them into outlawry, and they intended to make them pay for it.

Coming to Mr. Taylor of Lowell, they asked where he was from.

"St. Louis," he responded.

The "captain" eyed him closely. "Yes, and you are a newspaper reporter for the St. Louis Democrat, the vilest paper in the West. Go to Hot Springs and send the Democrat a telegram about this affair, and give them my compliments.”

Gov. Burbank asked them to return his papers, saying they could be of no benefit to them. The “captain” squatted down on his knees, and commenced examining them. Turning around to his followers he said, “Boys, I believe he is a detective—shoot him!” and forthwith he was covered with three pistols. “Stop,” said the leader, looking further. “I guess it’s all right,” and handed the Governor his papers. Coming to the gentleman from Syracuse, New York, who was going to the Springs for his health, he asked them to give him back five dollars so that he could telegraph home. Eyeing him closely, the chief responded that if he had no friends or money, he had better go and die—that he would be little loss any way. The fellow with the shot-gun kept pointing it at the St. Louis Democrat man, as they termed him, making such cheerful remarks as these: “I’ll bet I can shoot his hat off without touching a hair of his head.”

All of them seemed to be jolly fellows, and enjoyed the fun very much. None of the passengers were armed, and, as Mr. Crump expressed it, “they had the drop on them.” One passenger with the rheumatism, so badly afflicted that he could not get out of the coach; they did not touch, refusing to take anything he had.

A SKIRMISH AT NEOSHO, MO., WITH ILLINOIS TROOPS.

After the battle of Elk Horn, Arkansas, all of the then enlisted Confederate troops were ordered East of the Mississippi river. This was in March, 1862. After the evacuation of the Trans-Mississippi department by the Confederate troops, this left all of the Confederate states then West of the river in danger of being overrun by the enemy. There were always a few men who kept in the rear of the main army, and when the Confederate troops crossed the river a few remained behind. Among those few who remained behind were some as brave men as ever handled a gun or carried a sword. They did not care to leave their homes and their wives, daughters, mothers and sisters unprotected.

Col. J. T. Coffee was one of the men who did not relish the idea of going East of the Mississippi river with the Confederate army, and remained West of the river. By the 15th of April he was busily engaged in Southwest Missouri collecting together the deserters, or those who had neglected or refused to cross the river.

Col. Coffee's headquarters were upon Cowskin Prairie, not far from Marysville, Arkansas, a small village upon the line or corner of Missouri, Arkansas and the Cherokee Nation, partly in Arkansas and partly in the Nation. It was a very suitable place to recruit a regiment of men, as the country was somewhat mountainous, interspersed with tracts of beautiful prairie land, which furnished excellent pasture for the animals. Fresh water springs also abounded, which furnished excellent water for both men and horses. It was not long until Col. Coffee had succeeded in recruiting or bringing together a batallion of 200 men. He was desirous of making up a regiment, in order to have sufficient force to release his daughter, Bettie, who had been seized and thrust into a Federal prison at Bolivar, Polk county, Missouri, simply because this young lady, very beautiful and accomplished, of eighteen summers, was a little talkative, and advocated the rights of the Southern people to defend their altars and their firesides, and the green graves of their sires, from the ruthlessness of the invader, the Northern soldiers, who were then reducing their once peaceful and happy country to a state of devastation, misery and want. In the estimation of the Federal authorities, Miss Bettie was calculated to "add fuel to the flames," and arouse the Southern heart to resistance. On this account she was arrested and placed in prison, where her influence could not be heard and felt.

But in this they were greatly mistaken, as her arrest and imprisonment soon became known, and the result was that it only had the effect of still more arousing every man who had the least spark of Southern feeling in his heart, or in whose veins coursed Southern blood.

Col. Coffee's battalion of 200 men was tolerably well armed with shotguns and squirrel rifles. With his battalion and the aid of Col. Stanwatie, who was a half-breed Cherokee Indian, commanding a regiment, then stationed in the Nation, about forty miles distant, Col. Coffee hoped to accomplish the great object of his desire, the release of his daughter. The Cherokees, it will be remembered, were deeply and zealously devoted to the cause of the South, and the regiment under the command of Col. Stanwatie was organized for the purpose of aiding the Southern cause. Col. Coffee made known his intentions to Col. "Watie," as he was often called, who willingly furnished 200 men, commanded by the Major of the regiment. Col. Watie was very anxious that Neosho should be taken, as he had attacked that place with about 150 men some time previous and failed, sustaining the loss of a few men and one piece of artillery, he having been overpowered in numbers and the enemy having the advantage of improved arms and war material. The brave commander had stood by his field-piece, firing as rapidly as possible, after his men had retreated in confusion, and did not leave until all chance of success had become utterly impossible.

With the addition of the battalion from Col. Watie's regiment, Col. Coffee thought his force sufficient to capture Neosho, which was sixty miles distant. After nightfall upon the 5th of May, Col. Coffee's men took up the line of march for Neosho, and by the next night were within two miles of the place. In approaching Neosho, the main road was not taken, but the most direct route, the untraveled paths, and at times no regard was had to roads, but the direct course, traveling, as it were, by the compass. The most of the country through which Col. Coffee passed was a barren waste, with flinty soil, and mountainous. The small flint mountains in this section of country are separated by deep gulches, in which the most luxuriant grass grows, which affords splendid grazing for stock. In one of these gulches, within two miles of the town of Neosho, Col. Coffee concluded to wait the approach of day on the morning of the 7th. Before the break of day on that morning Col. Coffee again took up the line of march, passing through the timber until within half a mile of the town. A halt was then made and most of the men dismounted, leaving but forty cavalrymen, commanded by Capt. Jackman. The Confederate forces advanced to the rear of a field, containing seven or eight acres, in a creek bottom, back of which field was heavy timber, with thick undergrowth, where the horses were left in charge of a small guard. By this time daylight had appeared. The infantry were then ordered into line, and marched through heavy black-oak timber just back of town. Capt. Jackman was ordered to take a plain road leading to town, on the left of the infantry. The road entered the town on the northwest, but Jackman was ordered to pass around town and enter from the southwest. The sun was now up, shedding its rays of light on all around, and the Federal camp was in full view. As they ascended a slight eminence, at the outward part of the town, they had a full view of the place, which is situated upon a piece of low land south of a small creek, the Federal camp being directly in front of the Confederate line of infantry. Capt. Jackman had fired upon and captured the Federal outpost on the northwest. This occurred about the time Col. Coffee had got up within full view of the Federal camp, who were mostly up and engaged in getting breakfast. A charge was then ordered, which was made with a yell and determination that at once struck terror into the enemy's camp. As the charge was being made a frightened lady ran out of her house and got directly in front of the Confederate line, just as the Federals opened fire. Col. Coffee ordered two of his men to seize her and carry her into the house and close the door, which was done in a moment. Col. Coffee had given orders to his men to fire at the feet of the enemy, thereby insuring a more effective fire, if the orders were carried out, as it is a well known fact that all firing, in battle, ranges too high. Two rounds from the ranks of Coffee's men caused the enemy to break and retreat in confusion.

A second charge was ordered, which was successfully made and carried everything before it, and the Confederates were soon in the Federal camp, with the latter in full flight. Just then Capt. Jackman entered town upon the north.

The enemy retreated towards Newtonia. As Jackman entered the town he discovered two Dutchmen, heavily armed, making across a field near by, and he ordered two of his men to throw down the fence, follow and capture them. As they neared them they were commanded to halt, when one of them turned around and fired, killing one of Jackman's men. This occurred within plain view of the command, and it filled the breast of every man with revenge, and, as if prompted by the same impulse, nearly the whole company rushed through the open gap to have revenge for the death of their comrade, which was speedily accomplished.

The enemy was pursued several miles by Capt. Jackman, and their wagons, camp equipage and some arms captured. Their flag was also captured and fell into the hands of the Cherokees, who made a constant display of it, in a very boastful manner. It seemed to be their hearts' joy to have the honor of capturing the enemy's flag. Thus a complete victory was achieved. The loss on both sides was very light.

The evening previous to the battle some of the Federals had boasted that they would have 'coffee for breakfast,' some having just arrived, but the Coffee they got was of a different character than they expected to relish, and their coffee served to complete the breakfast of Col. Coffee's men.

After the battle Col. Coffee fell back upon Grand River, in the edge of the Nation, where he remained camped for some days, until a Federal command from Kansas, composed of Kansas Jayhawkers and Pin Indians, 1,100 men, were in hot pursuit of him. The Cherokees had fallen back to Watie's Mill, and this left Coffee with less than 200 men, a force insufficient to compete with the Federals, and he also fell back to the same point.

THE BATTLE OF POISON SPRINGS, ARKANSAS.

Warlike operations commenced in the Trans-Mississippi Department early in the spring of 1864. About the last of March the Federal authorities had devised or agreed upon a plan to carry on the war in the Western Department. Gen. Banks was to proceed up Red River to a certain point, disembark his troops, and march by land, passing through Louisiana and enter Texas upon the east, at a certain point. Gen. Steele was to move from Little Rock, Arkansas, with his troops, and those two armies were to unite or consolidate their forces in Texas and harvest the wheatfields of that State, carrying off all the cotton, &c. But Gen. Kirby Smith, who had command of all the Confederate forces of the Trans-Mississippi Department, was closely watching the Federal movements. About the last of March Major-General Sterling Price was ordered to Louisiana with all of his infantry, to oppose the movements of Gen. Banks. Gen. Price left all of his cavalry in Southern Arkansas, to confront the movement of Gen. Steele at Little Rock. Gen. Price and Gen. Dick Taylor, a son of old Zachariah Taylor, the hero of the battle of Buena Vista, Mexico, in 1848, combined their forces in Louisiana, at Mansfield. At this point a battle was fought, resulting in the routing of Gen. Banks with great loss. Gen. Steele began to move South about the same time, and was opposed by the cavalry of Gen. Marmaduke, Gen. Joe Shelby and Gen. Cabell, of Arkansas. All of the cavalry at this time was under the command, or subject to the orders of Gen. Marmaduke. He soon had heavy work to do, as Gen. Steele had a force of 16,000 men, while Gen. Marmaduke's whole command did not exceed 4,000 men. Heavy skirmishing soon commenced between the two commands, and was kept up every day from the first of April until the battle at Jenkin's Ferry, in which Gen. Steele was defeated by Gen. Price. All the Confederate cavalry could do was to keep the Federals in check until Gen. Price returned from Louisiana with his infantry. Gen Marmaduke had heavy skirmishing with Steele's forces at Spoonville and other places. He knew that Gen. Steele had four times his number and therefore avoided a general engagement.

As soon as Gen. Price and Gen. Taylor defeated Gen. Banks, Gen. Price returned to Arkansas with his infantry, coming upon Gen. Steele near Camden. Here Gen. Steele tried to induce Gen. Price to believe he intended making a stand, and as soon as he took possession of the town sent out a train of forage wagons, upon White Oak Creek, by the way of Poison Springs. With the train was a guard of 1,000 men. As soon as this information was obtained by Gen. Price, he sent out Gen. Greene of Missouri and Gen. Cabell of Arkansas, with their small brigades. They passed on up White Oak Creek some distance; until they came to where it forks. Gen. Green took his command up one fork and Gen. Cabell the other. After passing up these streams about four miles they came to a halt and waited for the enemy. During all this time Gen. Steele was moving his forces out of Camden, aiming to get to Little Rock. The forage wagons had been sent South. Thus it will be observed that his intention was to sell out that small force, well knowing they would be captured by the Confederate forces. The Federal forage train came down the north fork and opened fire on Gen. Cabell's troops, who returned the fire spiritedly. The train guard had two pieces of artillery. Gen. Cabell also had a battery of four guns, belonging to Col. Monroe's regiment. As soon as the enemy opened fire, Gen. Cabell sent a courier to Gen. Green, informing him that his troops were now engaged with the enemy, in a hot contest, and to move up his command at once. The courier returned with the information that he would soon be on hand with his command. By this time Gen. Cabell's troops were being driven back, with a heavy loss, when a second courier was sent to Gen. Green, telling him to hasten up on a double quick to his relief. The answer was soon received that Gen. Green was close at hand. Gen. Green had also sent back word to Gen. Cabell to get his men out of the way, as he, Green, intended to charge the enemy. Gen. Cabell did as directed. The enemy were now in an open field of about ten acres, when the Missourians came dashing in, in full charge, Gen. Green taking off his hat and holding it in his hand, leading the charge. Those noble and brave Missourians seemed to know no fear or danger, but rushed wildly into the field, scattering death and destruction all around. The Dutch and negroes of the Federal command fought well. It was a hand-to-hand contest, for half an hour. Some of the Dutch broke and ran from the field, but the most were killed in battle. The entire forage guard was composed of Dutch and negroes. Six hundred negroes were killed, as no quarters were given by the Rebels to them. Their guns, wagons, horses, &c., were all captured.

THE BATTLE OF CLEAR CREEK, MO.

This battle was fought on the second day of August, 1862, between some Missouri Confederate troops and Iowa Federals, being the First Iowa Cavalry, under the command of Col. Warren. The Missourians were from St. Clair county, and commanded by Capt. Hancock, who was afterwards promoted to the rank of Colonel. Some weeks previous to this small battle, so far as numbers on the Confederate side was concerned, although quite formidable on the part of the Federals, their loss being quite heavy, Capt. Hancock had been in St. Clair county, upon the banks of the Osage river, mustering together men, hoping to swell his number to a battalion, intending then to march them to the regular Confederate army, then in the State of Arkansas. At the time of the battle he had augmented his forces to near two hundred men, but only about seventy men were armed. Capt. Hancock's principal place of rendezvous was upon Clear creek. This creek is a small stream tributary to the Osage river, which takes its rise or heads near the northwest corner of Cedar county, and empties its waters into the Osage river three miles below Taborville, in St. Clair county. Upon the right bank of this stream, about six or seven miles from its mouth, in the timber, was Capt. Hancock and his men on the morning of the battle. At the time they were preparing to leave for the South, at the earliest possible moment, not anticipating an attack. Capt. Hancock had gathered together all the men he thought could be consolidated at the time. He felt confident that his whereabouts were known and thought it prudent to leave as soon as possible, as large Federal forces were within striking distance all around him. He did not suppose his exact position was known, but he felt assured that it was known he was in the county of St. Clair.

Some months before this Col. Warren had entered the county with one thousand cavalry. At this time he had his men divided up, a portion of them holding the post at Osceola, St. Clair county, a portion at Germantown, and a portion at Butler, both the latter places being in the adjoining county of Bates. As before stated, Capt. Hancock was getting ready to leave for the South, and would have been off in less than two hours after the fight commenced. A day or two previous he had also learned that Col. Coffee, Confederate, had captured the town of Greenfield, Dade county, Missouri, with most of the militia stationed there, and intended marching in that direction hoping to fall in with him.

Early upon the morning of the second of August, 1864, Capt. Hancock's pickets came into camp and reported that there was a body of men approaching from the west side of the timber. Five of Hancock's men, who were breakfasting at Mrs. McCulloch's a short distance from the camp, were captured. The Federal advance, which captured the five men at Mrs. McCulloch's, failed to get one man, and he watched an opportunity, and, with a revolver in each hand, made a dash on them and put them to flight to such an extent that his companions succeeded in making their escape.

As soon as Capt. Hancock learned of the approaching enemy, he formed his men in line of battle, selecting the best possible position for defence, which was a ravine along a field, the fence running along the field being very high, as the field or lot was used to keep mules secure. This ravine crossed the road near the field, and on both sides of the road the brush was quite thick, and down this road the Federals were expected to come. Capt. Hancock had all his horses taken back to a secure place and put in charge of a number of his men who were unarmed.

All of Hancock's men, with a very few exceptions, were raw recruits, who had never been under fire, and, as before stated, without arms, and unorganized. Most of the arms that were used were shotguns and squirrel rifles, with no prepared ammunition. Capt. Hancock had with him about one keg of powder, which, when divided up between his men, was a small allowance to each man, and required care and economy in its use. The ammunition was in charge of one man, and consequently on the morning of the fight, even up to the time of its actual commencement, the men were almost wholly without the means of resistance, and the distribution did not take place until after the men were placed in line of battle.

As soon as Capt. Hancock had made the preliminary arrangement of his men, he detailed a squad to go up the road towards the prairie, with instructions to decoy the Federals into the timber, opening fire on them as soon as they got within range, and if they hesitated to accept the challenge thus thrown out, to advance on them and force them into an engagement, and as soon as they found that the Federals were advancing to retreat on down the road, passing through their own ambushed lines, some forty or sixty yards, and then to wheel into the brush. Before the decoying squad started to lead the enemy into the trap prepared for them, one of the squad was detailed to keep in the rear on the retreat, thereby the more effectually inducing the Federals to follow, with the hope of at least capturing him.

Capt. Hancock arranged his men in a ravine, in line, ten feet apart, with instructions to fire directly to the front, but under no circumstances were they to fire until the head of the Federal cavalry reached a point directly opposite the head of their line, which would be known by the commencement of firing at the extreme head of the column.

When the Lieutenant, in command of the advance squad or decoying party, reached the prairie, he discovered the foe not far distant, upon the open plain, and as they got sight of the rebel boys they began to place their men in readiness for battle. They seemed to be eager for rebel blood, and soon put the advance guard to flight, pursuing them hotly on clear through the rebel lines. Capt. Hancock heard the roaring of the feet of the approaching animals, as they came in hot pursuit of his companions, and again cautioned his men to hold their fire until all had passed the proper point. "Boys," said he, "do not become excited, but keep perfectly cool and reserve your fire until I give the signal with my pistol, and then take deliberate aim at the man directly in your front. By so doing your fire will be well directed, and each of you will get a man, and thereby do much greater execution than you could otherwise possibly do." A moment afterwards the enemy came in sight, and after the rebel squad had passed through and the Federal head got opposite Capt. Hancock, he let loose with his pistol and brought down his man, at the same time crying out, "Huzza, my brave boys," when about seventy guns sent forth their deadly missiles into the ranks of the enemy, and down went riders and horses, along the entire line. The foe at once checked up, and their men positively cried out for mercy so deadly and destructive was the fire of the rebel ranks. But as they did not offer to surrender, the rebels at once, as soon as they reloaded, gave them the second round. The Federals then crowded up along the fence which enclosed the mule lot, spoken of heretofore, and after partially recovering from the terrible shock, they returned the fire in the direction of the ravine. But the rebels soon gave them the third round, which caused them to force their animals through and over the fence as best they could. A gap was made in the fence, and through this many a horse passed, though as he did so many a rider dropped dead. At length the Federals beat a hasty retreat.

Out of the two hundred Federals that came down the valley of Clear Creek, only about 120 escaped unhurt, nearly 80 falling dead in their tracks. The party was commanded by a Captain of Provost, Col. Warren not being with them. The entire Federal force sent out was 240 men, 40 being held back in reserve, but the reserve was never sent up. Capt. Handcock lost one man killed and two wounded. The man killed was Lee Bradley, of Bates county, Missouri, who left his position in the ravine and went out on the road, among the enemy, where he met his death. His grave now marks the battle-field. The Federal dead were hauled off to Butler, Bates county, after the fight.

As soon as the fight was over Capt. Hancock saw that his dead comrade was buried, the wounded cared for, and then took up his line of march for Dade county, Missouri. When the command arrived at the waters of Horse Creek, in Cedar county, a halt was ordered. While here the batallion was organized into companies and Capt. Hancock was elected Colonel. Here the guns of the men were arranged into squads according to their caliber, and ammunition prepared accordingly.

The line of march was again resumed and the command finally arrived at the headquarters of Col. J. T. Coffee, in Dade county, Mo., where the men were transferred to the regular Confederate army.

FIGHT AT PORT UNION, KANSAS.

During the fall of 1864, at the time of Gen. Price's last raid into Missouri, after the battle of Big Blue, Gen. Price entered Kansas and passed on South through the eastern portion. After passing by Fort Scott, a Lieutenant commanding 85 men, struck out across the country for Fort Union, Kansas, a small inland town containing a few dry goods stores, &c. Our informant says he never saw so much canned fruit in so small a place as this in his life. The place was garrisoned by 125 Federal troops. As Gen. Price's army had passed on South, this inland post had no fears from that source, as it was thought. The Commander of those 85 Confederates was a man who loved to fight whenever an opportunity offered itself, and there was anything like an equal chance to gain a victory. His men were all equally willing, and in fact had frequently been termed "blood-hounds," so eager were they to engage in battle. When the Confederates got within about one mile of the Fort they met a man who had just left there, and who was questioned about the number of troops there and all the particulars possible to obtain from him. He stated that there were about 25 men in the Fort, and the remainder, about 100, had left their guns inside the Fort and were scattered over the place drunk, as they had learned that Gen. Price had gone on South, hotly pressed by the Federal forces, and they concluded to have a jolly drunk in order to commemorate the event.

After parting with the man from the Fort the company started off in a gallop and did not slacken their speed until they entered the town, and then dashed into the Fort, completely taking the Federals by surprise, who were not aware of their presence until they commenced dealing out death and destruction on every side. The few inside the stockade were soon shot down and none left to tell the tale. After the terrible slaughter in the Fort, which was but the work of a few moments, the Confederates left the garrison and proceeded to town, which was situated in the prairie, near a clump of timber, where many of the Federal soldiers took refuge as soon as they heard the firing at the fortifications, but a short distance off. Some had mounted their horses and rode off across the prairie, in the direction of a creek, about two miles distant, but they were hotly pursued and shot down, not being able to make much resistance, having left their guns inside the Fort, though most of them had side-arms, which they used to the best possible advantage, and in several instances a hand-to-hand fight took place. But few escaped, nearly the whole of the Federal force was left dead upon the field of battle, as food for the cayotes that so numerously abounded in that section. Those who took refuge in the timber were charged upon by a portion of the Rebel cavalry, and most of them likewise fell victims of Rebel bullets.

After the fight was over it is said one could have walked some distance up the main street on dead men and horses, along the saloons. The whole time consumed in the fight was not over one hour, but it was a terrible slaughter, as nearly the whole Federal garrison were left dead upon the field of battle. The Rebel loss was one man killed and one wounded, the wounded man recovering in a short time. After the battle the Rebels entered the stores and helped themselves to such eatables as they could find, not in the least slighting the canned fruit, which was so plentiful, and quite a luxury to hungry and fatigued soldiers. After they had all helped themselves to something to eat, they then proceeded to dress themselves up in the best suits of clothing in the stores, which were in great abundance. They then mounted their horses and left the bloody and sacked town to its fate, striking across the prairie in a southerly direction, and entered the camp of their leader, Gen. Price, the next day, about night-fall.

LETTER FROM AN OLD CITIZEN OF MISSOURI.

Col. Harry W. Younger was murdered by a party of Union Soldiers, so called, and backed by the Government of the United States, but in truth and reality nothing more nor less than an organized band of thieves and cut-throats, who were a disgrace to any government. This brutal and highway murder and robbery took place on the western border of Missouri. This same party were of the number who drove Coleman and James Younger, sons of Col. Harry W. Younger, into the camp of Quantrell. These boys, left to themselves and not harrassed by the militia, were not disposed to hurt any one, and if they could have had their choice, would have remained quietly at home during the whole war, and attended to the farms of their father. But how could it be possible for them to do so, and time after time to see and hear the many depredations and outrages that were being committed upon their parents? Their father robbed of his property, then waylaid, murdered and robbed of the money he had just received for a lot of stock which he had sold; their old mother insulted and abused, compelled to fire her own house with her own hands, driven from place to place, harrassed and deviled to such an extent that she at length filled an early grave. All these things are true to the very letter and well known to hundreds of as good citizens as ever lived in Missouri. These things, and many others of less importance, all tended to drive the Younger boys to desperation and to induce them to seek revenge upon those who had perpetrated the outrages. It was but natural for them so to do. They would not have been human to do otherwise. That Cole Younger did seek out and shoot down some, perhaps nearly all, of the men who murdered his father, there seems to be little doubt. It is also true that there still lives one of the prime movers and plotters of the murder of his father, and who to this day carries the valuable gold watch taken from the body of Col. Younger after he had been murdered ; and it is also true that Cole Younger did prevent John Younger from taking the life of this same guilty and heartless wretch about two years ago at Monegaw Springs, in St. Clair county. The party of murderers and robbers consisted of ten men, and those more intimate with them and the whole circumstance than the writer of this, have assured me that nine met their just deserts and filled untimely graves, leaving, as before stated, yet one of the most guilty, unharmed, whose life seems to be a miserable one indeed, as it is said that he is scarcely ever seen outside of his house. Col. H. W. Younger, as was well known, was a staunch Union man at the breaking out of the war, and, therefore, there could be no excuse for the treatment he received at the hands of those calling themselves Union men ; they were not Union men, they were Union thieves. What must be the remorse of conscience of the poor, miserable creature who still lives, when he reflects on his past life and conduct ? Methinks I can see that man at the dark and dreary hour of midnight, when all is silent and still as the grave, tossing to and fro upon his couch, unable to sleep, with a vision of his murdered victim standing before him ; with his life-blood oozing from the wounds of his mangled body. A resident of the town in which this man now lives, asserts that he is scarcely ever seen on the streets in daylight, but stealthily sneaks out at night, in disguise. Those who claim to be cognizant of the fact, also assert that there are now living near the town of Butler two widows, whose husbands were shot down in cold blood by the orders of this same individual, who was then acting as Captain. Notwithstanding this, this miserable creature is allowed to live in that community unpunished and unharmed, save that punishment inflicted upon him by an Allwise Providence.

Before the war it is said this same man was miserably poor, but now he seems to have plenty of this world's goods and lives in good style. He owns two farms, runs a livery stable and store, but where or when he got the money, no one knows but himself.

With regard to how the Younger boys make a living, if they do not commit robberies, a question very often asked but seldom answered correctly, I will give some facts well known to me. Nearly ever since the war these boys have had a cattle ranch in Western Texas, where they herd a large number of cattle, which are usually sold every fall and shipped north and east. Those acquainted with this business well understand the large profits arising therefrom, and can easily account for the fact that at times these boys have plenty of money, particularly when they visit Missouri, which is usually in the fall. During the summer of 1873, these boys visited Monegaw Springs, in St. Clair county, Missouri, where there were hundreds of persons stopping at the time, partaking of the curative waters. At these Springs their grandfather, Chas. F. Younger, spent the latter years of his life. He died in 1873, within five miles of the Springs, surrounded by many old acquaintances and friends, some of whom ranked among the oldest citizens of St. Clair county. Whenever the Younger Brothers passed through this portion of the State they always stopped to see their grandfather as well as visit other acquaintances. On this account some of the old citizens of St. Clair county, who are "well to do" farmers, have been accused of harboring and protecting horse-thieves, murderers, &c. Suffice it to say that those few old citizens whom the Youngers do visit when in this section of the state, cannot believe that the Youngers are guilty of what they have been so frequently charged, while in several instances they know from their own personal knowledge that the charges are false, as the boys were at their houses the very times they are charged with being hundreds of miles away committing depredations. Stealing and depredations of every kind have been the order of the day ever since the close of the war, and instead of diminishing, they seem to increase year after year, and in almost every instance, unless the parties are at the time apprehended, some newspapers take up the old cry of Younger Brothers, and soon it is heralded forth all over the country. Occasionally some newspaper editor or correspondent ventures to assert that the Youngers had nothing to do with the affair, but so general seems to be the belief that the Youngers are the only ones who can perpetrate such acts of lawlessness, that their assertions are drowned in the great cry of "Younger Brothers." This very forcibly reminds me of the story told of an old Quaker, in Philadelphia, many years ago. A dog went into his kitchen and stole a leg of mutton, and on learning the fact the old Quaker took after him, up the street, crying out in a loud voice, "bad dog, bad dog." The cry of "mad dog" was immediately taken up by those passing, when every one took after him and very soon succeeded in killing him. When the Quaker arrived and found that the crowd had killed him, he asked why they had done so. Why, said one, did you not cry out "mad dog?" no, replied the Quaker, I said "bad dog," for so he is; he stole my meat. So it is with the Younger Brothers; they have been bad during the war, and did, possibly, revenge the murder of their father and cruel treatment of their mother, but further than this, since the war terminated, nothing wrong can be proven against them.

For some time after the occurrence Cole Younger was accused of having a hand in the Iowa train robbery, which occurred on Monday morning, July 21st, 1873, while it can be proven by 20 or 30 of the most respectable men in St. Clair county, Missouri, that he was at Monegaw Springs on Sunday afternoon, the 20th of July, not over 15 hours before the robbery took place, and could not possibly have been there. Did he possess the wings of the fleetest bird of the air, he could not have passed from Monegaw Springs to Iowa, to the place where the robbery occurred.

I am in no way connected with the Youngers, by family ties or blood relation, neither have I any sympathy with men who I believe do wrong, but I think that justice should be done to all, and therefore have penned this letter for your work about to be published, which, should you think proper, you are at liberty to use.

Respectfully Yours, &c.,

S. M. O.

THE NEVADA STAGE ROBBERY.

About the 10th or 12th of August, 1873, four brigands stopped a stage in Nevada Territory, which carried Wells, Fargo & Co.'s safe, and robbed it of a large sum of money. Mr. E. Baldwin, Chief Engineer of the Davenport (Iowa) & St. Paul Railroad, who was a passenger on the stage, gives the following account of the robbery:

Four men sprang from behind rocks, seized the leaders by the bit, and bade the driver "get down from there." It was some time before the passengers could understand the interruption, but at last they were made to comprehend it without much ceremony. The driver was ordered to take the horses from the coach and lead them to one side. He obeyed. Next the passengers were told to "dismount" and seat themselves on a red-wood log. As each of the robbers held a double-barreled shot-gun, and swore that somebody's brains would be spilled unless "you step right lively now," the order was obeyed with alacrity. The passengers sat still as mice under the cover of the shot-guns, and silently watched the operations of the robbers in getting at the contents of the safe. The scoundrels drilled holes about the lock, and elsewhere in the door, poured powder in the openings, tamped them, and then lighted the fuse. In a half minute there was a thick puff of smoke, a dull heavy sound, and there lay the safe open. It was but the work of a minute to sack the bags of gold and packages of greenbacks, and then the robbers ordered the passengers to "mount." The travelers obeyed, and took their seats; then the driver was ordered to "hitch up," and he did as he was told—and was requested to "drive on quick, and not lag once for a mile." And the four-horse team flew away from the locality in locomotive speed. The robbers gobbled between $8,000 and $12,000.

THE QUINCY, ILLINOIS, BANK ROBBERY.

The night of the 12th and 13th of February, 1874, the First National Bank of Quincy, Illinois, was robbed of nearly a half million dollars. On the morning of the 13th, the porter, on going into the bank, discovered that the ceiling and walls near the vault were badly shattered. He at once notified the officials, when an investigation was made. It was soon discovered that the vault door could not be unlocked. An exploration was made in the second story of the building where an opening was found in the hall floor through which the burglars had descended on the top of the vault. Further examination showed that a hole over three feet square had been drilled through three feet of solid masonry, and a plate of boiler iron two feet square cut from the lining of the vault with chilled chisels. This done access was obtained to the interior of the vault, where were two safes, one containing the money and special deposits of the bank, and the other government bonds and valuable papers. The money safe was found with the doors blown off their hinges and depleted of all its contents, save a bag of gold. There was in it $90,000 in currency belonging to the bank, $200,000 in Adams county bonds worth par, and special deposits of greenbacks and government bonds that run the total up to $500,000. The other safe containing valuable papers and bonds was also charged with powder and blasted, but did not yield, and its contents were safe.

The manner of working, after reaching the interior of the vault, was as follows: Powder was drilled into the cracks around and between the hinges of each safe, and held fast by the free use of putty. A connection fuse was then adjusted to set both blasts off at once, and then passed through a rubber hose to the top of the highest safe, where a small pistol was screwed on an old ledger and so arranged that when it was discharged it set off the fuse. The pistol was fired by means of a cord which led from the vault to the street, and thus the burglars set off the explosion when the vicinity of the bank was clear of people. Several persons in adjacent buildings heard the sound and felt the concussion, but thought it nothing serious.

We believe it was not charged that any of the Youngers had a hand in this.

THE MARTLING, MISSOURI, SAFE ROBBERY.

On the 29th of August, 1873, the safe of Messrs. Crowder, Winn & Co., Commission Merchants of Martling, Southwest Missouri, and Agents of the Adams' Express Company, was blown open and robbed of about $4,000 in cash and some silver ware.

THE OSCEOLA, MISSOURI, SAVINGS BANK.

On the morning of the 14th of March, 1875, about two o'clock, an attempt was made to rob the Osceola Savings Bank, at Osceola, St. Clair county, Missouri, by three young men living in the vicinity of town, named James Henley, William Henley and John Longdon. They had also taken into their confidence a young man living in town named William Hurt, but he repented before the feat was attempted to be accomplished, and conveyed the information to Mr. William O. Mead, the Cashier of the bank. Mr. Mead made the necessary preparations to receive the thieves, by engaging the services of some half dozen men and having them secreted and armed for the occasion. The boys were allowed to bore off the lock of the back door, when they were fired upon by several men stationed in Masonic Hall, which building adjoins the bank building, extending some twenty feet further back, to the alley. One of the men, John Longdon, was wounded, and captured shortly afterwards, and one other, William Henley, was arrested near Fort Scott, Kansas, about ten days afterwards. An ox team had been procured and hitched up, with which they expected to carry off the bank safe, it not being a very large one, yet much too large for those boys to have handled. The safe was in the back part of the bank building, near the door. The door is about four feet from the ground, and it was their intention to back the wagon up to the door and roll the safe on it. The wagon to be used was a heavy one, belonging to the sawmill of Alton, Sutherland & Co., and had been prepared for the occasion that night, by placing heavy oak planks on it. The whole thing was admirably planned, and worthy of older heads and hands at such business. It was their intention to convey the safe some distance down the river, in the hills, where they intended to break it open and secure the money it contained, about $12,000. Had it not been for young Hurt, who divulged the plan, and had they fully succeeded in their designs without being discovered, it is certain that the Youngers would have been credited with this robbery.

STORE ROBBED NEAR CLINTON, MO.

A most daring robbery occurred at the store Mr. D. C. Lambert, twelve miles north of Clinton, Henry county, Missouri, about six o'clock on the evening of the 13th of May, 1875. The location of this robbery, as the reader will perceive, is not over forty miles from Monegaw Springs, St. Clair county, the neighborhood where the Youngers stay when in this section of Missouri. Two men entered the store and called for cigars, and while Mr. Lambert's back was towards them, they drew their revolvers, thrust them in his face, and commanded him to "hold up his hands." Two more men then entered, drew their revolvers and demanded money. Mr. Lambert then gave them all he had, about $150, when the leader of the party demanded of Lambert that he disclose the whereabouts of some $3,000 or $4,000 in gold, which his neighbors said he had secreted somewhere, on failure of which he was to suffer death. A young lady happened to come into the store about this time, and seeing the situation of affairs, threw herself between the robbers and Mr. Lambert, and begged of them to spare his life. The outlaws then discussed the propriety of hanging Lambert, but if they really had any intention of so doing did not carry it into execution. About this time another of the robbers, who had remained outside, politely asked two ladies and two gentlemen, who were playing croquet in the rear of the store building, to step inside, which they did without many unnecessary words, on discovering that the fellow was armed. The whole party were then placed under guard and told to keep quiet, but one of the scoundrels remained on watch in the store, while each door of the building was guarded by another of them. The leader then made a thorough search of the building, examining all trunks, boxes, &c., but found no traces of the $3,000 or $4,000 he spoke of. He found, however, three revolvers, one gun and $11 of money belonging to the Shawnee postoffice, all of which was carried off. The party also helped themselves to such goods as they wanted. The loss of Mr. Lambert, in all amounted to about $300. They remained about one hour and a half, keeping their prisoners under guard all the while, until they were all mounted, when they rode rapidly off. Everything was conducted so calmly and quietly, that a blacksmith fifty yards distant knew nothing of the affair until the robbers left. They were all young men, well armed, and mounted on splendid animals. This robbery, like almost every other one of a similar character, where great boldness and skill are shown, has been charged to the account of the Younger Brothers, although neither of the boys had been seen in the State for six months previous. No clue to the robbers has ever been obtained.

PROPOSED PARDON OF THE YOUNGERS AND JAMES BOYS.

Gen. Jones, an eminent lawyer of Calloway county, and member of the Missouri House of Representatives, introduced the following into that body about the first of March, 1875, which, however, owing probably to the late time at which it was presented, failed to pass the Legislature. It received the approval of the Attorney-General, as well as many able lawyers of the State of Missouri. The following is the full bill:

Whereas, Equality is the essence of true Democracy, and no distinctions in person or class should ever be made by law, under a government of the people possessed of virtue, intelligence and true courage ; and

Whereas, By the 4th section of the 11th article of the Constitution of Missouri all persons in the military service of the United States, or who acted under the authority thereof in this State, are relieved from all civil liability and all criminal punishment for all acts done by them since the 1st day of January, A. D., 1861 ; and

Whereas, By the 12th section of the said 11th article of said Constitution, provision is made by which under certain circumstances may be seized, transported to, indicted, tried and punished in distant countries, any Confederate or other person under band of despotic pleasure, thereby contravening the Constitution of the United States and every principle of enlightened humanity ; and

Whereas, Such discrimination evinces a want of manly generosity and statesmanship on the part of the party imposing, and of courage and manhood on the part of the party tamely submitting thereto.

Whereas, Under the outlawry pronounced against Jesse W. James, Frank James, Coleman Younger, Robert Younger and others, who gallantly periled their lives and their all in the defence of their principles, they are of necessity made desperate, driven as they are from the fields of honest industry, from their friends, their families, their homes and their country, they can know no law but the law of self-preservation, can have no respect for and feel no allegiance to a government which forces them to the very acts it professes to deprecate, and then offer a bounty for their apprehension, and arms foreign mercenaries with power to capture and kill them; and

Whereas, Believing these men too brave to be mean, too generous to be revengeful, and too gallant and honorable to betray a friend or break a promise; and believing further that most, if not all the offences with which they are charged have been committed by others, and perhaps by those pretending to hunt them, or by their confederates; that their names are and have been used to divert suspicion from and thereby relieve the actual perpetrators; that the return of these men to their homes and friends would have the effect of greatly lessening crime in our State by turning public attention to the real criminals, and that common justice, sound policy and true statesmanship alike demand that amnesty should be extended to all alike of both parties for all acts done or charged to have been done during the war; therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives, the Senate concurring therein:

That the Governor of the State be and he is hereby requested to issue his proclamation notifying the said Jesse W. James, Frank James, Coleman Younger, Robert Younger and James Younger, and others, that full and complete amnesty and pardon will be granted them for all acts charged or committed by them during the late civil war, and inviting them peaceably to return to their respective homes in this State and there quietly to remain, submitting themselves to such proceedings as may be instituted against them by the courts for all offences charged to have been committed since said war, promising and guaranteeing to them and each of them full protection and a fair trial therein, and that full protection shall be given them from the time of their entrance into the State and his notice thereof under said proclamation and invitation.

THE JAMES AND YOUNGERS.

ST. LOUIS, March 15, 1875.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE GLOBE :

In your issue of last Saturday, the 13th, I read with much interest a communication against the granting of any amnesty to the James and Youngers. It was post-marked Charleston, Mo., and signed "Confederate." For the same reasons that "Confederate" selected the Globe as his medium for reaching the public ear," so do I, a Republican, a Federal soldier, who belonged to the Second Colorado Cavalry, who fought the James and Youngers on twenty different occasions, who knows something of their history, and who believes as firmly as he believes in truth and justice that they have been lied upon by public opinion, slandered, and put in the attitude of the traditional dog who has to be hung because he has an ill name.

I do not propose to speak for the Dispatch, or defend the Dispatch—for the Dispatch is perfectly competent to do that for itself—but I do ask the Globe to give both sides of this subject, as I know the Globe is always willing to do for every question. As it happens, I claim to know as much about these famous men as “Confederate,” although my opportunities for information were not as favorable as his, probably, because of the color of the uniform that clothed each of us ; but one thing I am absolute in my belief of, and that is it is time for the war to be over in truth. Many things were done on the border by both sides that should have been forgotten when peace came, and when an impartial history comes to be written, it will be found that among the Guerrillas who wore the blue, and the Guerrillas who wore the gray, there was not even the difference of a single desperate deed the less on either side.

To answer “Confederate” as I think he should be answered, it will be necessary for me to ask sufficient space at your hands to take up his charges seriatim, and dispose of them by such references to establish facts as may be verified by any impartial man who chooses to make an investigation of them. His first reference is to the robbery of the Gallatin Bank, in Davies county, Missouri ; the killing of its cashier, Captain John W. Sheets, and the subsequent pursuit of the robbers into Clay county. I was in Kansas City at the time this took place. Indeed, from the mustering out of our regiment until 1873, I lived in various portions of Jackson county, and among the worst and most desperate of the survivors of the bands of Quantrell, Todd and Anderson—men whom

I had fought daily, sometimes getting the best and sometimes the worst of the fighting—and I never saw a more peaceful and law-abiding set of people, and never people more willing to let by-gones be by-gones. I know that the Jameses were accused of this attack on the bank, but I know further, that they published in the Kansas City Times nearly a column of affidavits from some of the best known and most respectable citizens of Clay county, attesting their innocence of this charge. One of these affidavits was signed by a well known Justice of the Peace, and another by the present Sheriff of the county, Captain John C. Groom. I give his name so that he may be referred to if anybody so desires. The affidavits are positive in the declaration that Jesse and Frank James were seen and talked to only a few hours before and after the robbery was perpetrated, and that it was a physical impossibility for them to have been in Kearney one hour, and eighty odd miles off in Gallatin the next, and back again eighty odd miles in Kearney the third hour. These affidavits are on file, and were sworn to and executed by as truthful men as there are in Missouri.

The next charge is made against the Youngers, and a reference is made to the fight in St. Clair county, in which John Younger had been killed. Now, John Younger had never been even accused of having a hand in any robbery. No reward was out for him. Coleman and James Younger had, but one hundred good citizens of St. Clair county would have come forward at any time to John Younger's constant presence at home. He was the mainstay of a family of helpless girls. The father had been killed at the beginning of the war by Kansas men. The mother had been forced, with a pistol at her head, to set fire to her own house, and to go on foot for shelter through a deep snow to a neighbor's. From this exposure, a disease was contracted which soon put her in her grave. Acting under the belief that the Youngers had been engaged in the robbery of the Iron Mountain Railroad, at Gad's Hill, a posse of detectives went into St. Clair county in search of them. The hunted men—having the same love of life that is implanted in the breast of everybody—turned out to hunt their pursuers. It was the intention of the Youngers to disarm the detectives, and for this purpose called upon them to surrender, having first "got the drop" on them. It was done, apparently, the detectives threw down their arms; but from all the evidence now before me, I am certain that Lull was so excited when he shot John Younger that he did not know what he was doing. He had but a single-barrel pistol; he could only hope, at the best, to kill one of the brothers, while the other brother, unharmed and heavily armed, would be absolutely certain to have revenge. Lull had been the first man to call upon his comrades to throw down their arms, and had himself cast off a brace of navy revolvers, still retaining a derringer, however, which he used when John Younger, supposing the whole party without weapons, had quite carelessly uncovered them with his double-barreled shot-gun. If Lull had meant to fight, he should have fought just as soon as the Younger party came in sight; but instead of doing this he called for a surrender, and set the example himself of throwing his pistols on the ground, and then treacherously shooting one of the Youngers after he had been the means of putting the lives of his own comrades in desperate jeopardy. It was not war, common sense, fair dealing as between friends, nor the act of a brave man. James Younger, when he saw his brother John shot down, had but one thing to do—kill. And he did. He was not the assailant in the light that "Confederate" puts it. He was merely endeavoring to disarm men and keep them from killing him who had openly boasted of their intentions, and who were working for blood money, merely because it was the suspicion at Pinkerton's headquarters that the Youngers had robbed the Gad's Hill railroad train.

And now, Mr. Editor, a word or two in relation to this Gad's Hill robbery. Sometime last fall Governor Woodson wrote to Mr. Thomas Allen, as I have been reliably and semi-officially informed, and stated to him that he knew the whereabouts of the Youngers, and that if he, Allen, would furnish the necessary affidavit to the effect that they had robbed his train, or that he believed they had, he would have them arrested at once. Mr. Allen replied that he had employed able detectives himself, that Pinkerton's detectives had also been at work on the case, that a thorough examination of all the circumstances attending the outrage had been made, and that, so far from making an affidavit that the Youngers were at Gad's Hill, he could much more conscientiously make an affidavit that they had not been there. And yet for this robbery "Confederate" denounces them without knowing a single fact of the case, except what was published in the flaming sensation reports of the newspapers, and yet for this robbery they and the James brothers are made notorious from one extent of the land to the other.

I never met either of these men except on the battle field. They were with Jo. Shelby in 1874, with his notorious advance, led by Arthur McCoy and the quiet and desperate Jim Wood, now Circuit Clerk of Pettis county, and I was in Captain Kingsbury's company, of the Second Colorado. We held the rear of Curtis' retreating division, which, under Jim Lane, had been driven with some confusion from Lexington by General Shelby. Our regiment and this advance of Shelby's met hand-to-hand this side of Independence, about four miles. It was a desperate fight. Nothing could stop Shelby's charge. We killed George Todd there, one of the worst guerrillas the world ever produced. Shelby's men killed our Major, Smith, a noble and brave soldier. We kept falling back and fighting, and they kept crowding us and fighting until darkness stopped the slaughter. I undertand that on the staff of the Dispatch—the paper which "Confederate" condemns rather strongly for its advocacy of amnesty—is one of Shelby's soldiers. If that be so, he will bear me out in the assertion that never brave men met braver men than when the Second Colorado and Shelby's leading regiment came together at intervals for one long autumn day in 1864. And now I, as a Federal soldier, join with the Dispatch in asking amnesty for these men. It is the best thing that can be done. Kansas passed an oblivion act for all her soldiers, and I tell you Lane, Jennison, Montgomery, Goss and Cleveland did things in Missouri and Arkansas that could never have been surpassed by things done by Anderson, Quantrell, Todd, Poole, Thraillkill, the Jameses or the Youngers.

I know that when the war was over, the Youngers came home and tried to live like the balance of the guerrillas on both sides. Vigilant Committees drove them away. Many of their old comrades were waylaid, shot, and assassinated. Some who surrendered to take a trial for charges preferred against them, were hung at night by armed and masked men. It was the same case with the Jameses. They were waylaid; one of them was badly wounded from the brush, their mother's life and the lives of their families were placed in peril, and, of course, these men had to do the next best thing, they had to put on arms and defend themselves. Every robbery committed in the West for the past eight years has been put upon them. And, as an illustration of the unfairness and injustice of the newspapers—the only real manufacturers, after all, of public opinion—it will be only necessary to recall the fact that, on the day the train was robbed at Muncie, Kansas, a bank was also robbed at Corinth, Miss., and one in Tennessee. In each case the telegraph reported the Jameses and Youngers present, and, from that day to this, a contradiction of the hurtful lie has never been made nor never will.

I claim that these men should have a chance, and I have a right to urge this, knowing that men with war records just as bad, on our side, have received rewards and promotions. It cannot be denied truthfully by anybody that they tried to live in peace after the war closed, and that they were not permitted to do so. As soon as they were forced into the brush by proscription, everything mean and outrageous was laid at their door. The State can afford to give them a chance now, and thus break up a whole band of thieves and robbers who are committing depredation in their names.

THE BANK ROBBERY.

About 2 o'clock on the afternoon of September 7th, 1876, eight men entered the town of Northfield, Minnesota, and proceeded to the bank. Three entered it and sprang over the counter, and ordered the cashier, J. L. Haywood, with a knife at his throat, to open the vault. At the same time, all persons in the bank, A. E. Bunker, cashier, his assistant and Frank Wilcox, clerk, were ordered to hold up their hands. Mr. Haywood refused to obey orders and open the money vault. His neck had been slightly scratched with a knife. Still persisting, the robbers put the muzzle of a pistol to his right temple and fired. Haywood fell dead. They then turned to Mr. Bunker and ordered him to open the vault. He said he did not know the combination. As the robbers made demonstrations towards him he ran out the back door. They fired at him, shooting him through the shoulder. Mr. Wilcox was not interfered with. While this was transpiring within, people of the city without were doing good work. Two of the robbers were killed outright and one wounded. The wounded man was taken away by his confederates. One of their horses was killed and one captured. The robbers did not get into the vault, nor did they find the cashier's drawer except the nickel drawer, and a handful of nickels taken from it was thrown to the floor. Four of the eight came to town before midday, and waited on the north side of the bridge till the other four came into town from Dundas. The men were all well mounted and armed with navy revolvers, with cartridges, in belts around their bodies. When the robbers crossed the bridge entering town they drew revolvers, and putting their horses into full gallop dashed through the street, shouting to the people on the walks to get inside. While the three men were engaged in the bank the others stood on the street threatening to shoot any one who interfered, and firing several harmless shots. Pistols and guns were quickly secured by citizens, and a young man named Wheeler from the window of the opposite building picked off one of the villains, shooting him through the heart. Another shot thought to be from Wheeler immediately after prostrated another, when the robbers mounted their horses and beat a retreat. A third robber was hit but escaped. A band of fifty citizens was organized, and headed by Wheeler started in pursuit.

On the 8th fourteen of the citizens in pursuit of the robbers overtook them late in the afternoon in a ravine a short distance from Shieldsville, when a number of shots were exchanged, killing one of the horses of the pursued. In all about 400 men were pursuing them. Gov. Pillsburg offered a reward of $1,000 for each of the robbers. Intense excitement prevails throughout that whole section of country.

A dispatch of the 10th states that the citizens are in hot pursuit, with a prospect of capturing or killing the band.

On the 12th the horses and saddles of the robbers were found in the timber near Cleveland.

The pursuit was continued from day to day until the afternoon of the 21st, when word was received from Sheriff McDonald, of Sioux City, that he had killed one of the robbers and captured three others, two of whom were mortally wounded; his party consisting of about 150 men. They were captured near Madelia, Watonwan county, Minnesota. They were pursued to a swamp, which was completely surrounded and the men gradually closed in upon them, keeping up a continuous fire, which was returned by the four robbers until one of their number was killed and two others supposed to be mortally wounded, and then only did they surrender. After being taken prisoners, two of them confessed to the Sheriff that they were the Younger Brothers, but refused to tell who their dead comrade was.

In the afternoon of the 22d, one of the editors of the St. Paul Pioneer Press went to Madelia and interviewed the Bandits. He says:

“I first called on Cole and James Younger, who occupy a bed together. Both are terribly wounded, and their faces much disfigured. They certainly do not look like such desperadoes as they are. Cole, who has bright red whiskers, had his right eye bandaged, and said he was suffering from seven wounds. James has a fearful looking mouth, the lower jaw bone being shattered. I told them I represented the Pioneer Press, and asked if they wished to say anything to the public. Cole was much obliged, and asked if I would kindly express their thanks to the citizens of Madelia, who had treated them with wonderful kindness. He expressed his surprise at such treatment, and was grateful for it. The doctor would not allow them to talk much, and as curious people were passing in and out, I left them to call on Bob. These men suffer much, and their talk is sometimes delirious. Both are brave, never moaning, and are receiving every possible attention. I found Bob, as he asked to be called for short, lying in bed, shackled and suffering from a wound in the arm received at Northfield, and from a wound in the breast got yesterday. He was pleasant, cheerful and communicative. He is a six-foot boy, 23 years old, and as fine looking a specimen of manhood as I ever saw. He has a kind expression, and speaks in a low, gentle tone, using the best of language—no oaths or slang. He was willing to talk of himself, but positively declined to say anything of the movements of the other men. I gave him a cigar, for which he was very grateful, and arose to smoke while he conversed. He said he had tried a desperate game and lost. They were rough boys and used to rough work, and must abide by the consequences. He was inclined to think Haywood was more frightened than brave. He was in the bank, and said the shooting of the cashier was an impulse of passion on the part of the man who shot him. He said they all deeply regretted it. They could have picked off many citizens, as all were dead shots, but did not desire to do murder. He would not say who shot Haywood. He said the witnesses in Northfield undoubtedly knew. This was in answer to the question: Did the robber killed yesterday shoot him? Of course, he regretted his situation, but all the chances were weighed before starting in. He had looked over the other banks before deciding, and knew all about those in the large places, and wished now he had undertaken one of them, as the chance to retreat was much better in a small place. At Shieldsville they frightened the boys badly, but did not shoot to kill anybody. They could have easily shot several. They staid in the woods about Kilkenny Thursday night, when they crossed the ford at Little Cannon. They knew the guards had run, but did not know how many. They moved back into the woods, but started soon to make a crossing before the guards were reinforced. They camped Friday night where the horses were found. They left at daylight, made a little headway, stopped on a sort of a peninsula, probably half a mile from the German church, but part of a day. They made a fire and took comfort. They shot a pig and a calf, both in the head, but they refused to die, and they dare not fire much. They pushed on Sunday night until midnight, and camped in Marysburgh. They heard the church-bell strike six, and thought it was a mile away. They made a fire there and had a good meal of corn and potatoes. Monday they made good headway. At night they camped in a field in the bushes. Twice they were alarmed by people passing near, though they did not go to Indian Lake, as supposed by Sheriff Davis. They said Dunning took a solemn oath not to reveal having seen them. They would not have shot him under any circumstances, and did not tie him in the woods from human feelings, as they feared he would not be found, and would die there. When passing through Mankato the steam-whistle of the oil-mill blew midnight, and startled them. They hid awhile and then passed on, and did not hear or see the guards at the bridge. After crossing, they got four watermelons and had a feast. He said they intended to call around some day and pay the gentleman for them. They got two old hens and one spring chicken at a house near by, and in fifteen minutes would have had a good breakfast, but they were alarmed by shouting, either of men on the railroad train or by pursuers. They saw one man looking for boot-tracks, but did not think they were pursuers, but ran up a bank. It was the closest call they had. They did not cross the Blue Earth river then, but did during the day. They then kept on through the woods. Two men then left, and, as the pursuit was directed after them, they had an easier time. He blamed himself for the capture, as he was overcome by drowsiness and insisted on remaining in the field, while the others wished to keep on. They would not leave him; if they had gone half a mile they would not have been caught. He declined saying anything about his previous life. He said they had no regular leader. Every man expected to do his work, whatever it was.

“ His wound is in the elbow joint of the right arm, the joint being fractured, and he cannot straighten the arm nor control the fingers. He is very polite; talks when questioned, but not obtrusive, and is so mild-mannered that he would make a good impression on anybody. He shows much gratitude for his good treatment, and fears to give trouble. He says they were all tough, and could have endured much longer. He insisted that it was his own fault that they were captured, as his lagging gave them away. He says the men who captured them were brave fellows.

The dead bandit is a man of very marked physiognomy, coal black hair, whiskers, moustache and eye-brows. His face shows great determination. He must have been killed instantly. On his body were found a compass, state map and pocket-book, with $5. Two of the others had the same amount, and James Younger had $150. Cole had a pocket-book and compass. None had watches. Their clothes were terribly used up. All were well supplied by the citizens. Bob says the coats found in the camp at Mankato belonged to him. They were making due west as near as possible—he would not say where to. Around the face of the dead man flowers had been placed by some lady, and others are scattered on his breast. The swollen features present a horrible sight. Barton had agreed to take the prisoners to St. Paul, but since arriving he has changed his mind, and will proceed directly to Faribault by way of Mankato, leaving here at 5:45 A. M. The body of the dead robber goes by the same train to St. Paul to be embalmed. The trip will be hard on the wounded men, particularly the one shot in the jaw. He suffers much. The doctors here object to moving him, but the men are plucky and will go all right. The town is full of people, but all quiet.

No one is admitted to the hotel, which is strongly guarded. When found, the robbers had pieces of underclothing tied on their feet in place of stockings. Cole Younger's toe nails fell off when his boots were removed. He told the doctor he did not care for himself, if dead all would be over in five minutes; was anxious about his brother, and told him to cheer up. He asked the doctor if he would die. While his wounds were being dressed he did not flinch nor move a muscle. He says that when the two comrades left they gave them most of the money, watches, rings and valuables, thinking their chances best."

ANOTHER INTERVIEW WITH THE ROBBERS.

The editor of the St. Peter Tribune went to Madelia Thursday, and from an extra issued yesterday we extract the following account of an interview with Bob Younger:

He is a man fully six feet high, well built, sandy complexion, and has a pleasant face. We should pick him out of any crowd as a kind-hearted man whom we should expect would grant a favor readily. He conversed freely and answered most of the questions put to him without apparent reserve.

He admitted that the party were engaged in the Northfield robbery, and in reply to our question why they killed the cashier, he said: "It was a d—d fool trick." We asked him if they hadn't a rough time in Minnesota, and he replied that "he had never been in anything like it before." We also asked him why they selected the Northfield bank to rob in preference to others. His reply was that they thought there was more money to be had there—that in Mankato there were three banks and the money was too much divided. In St. Peter he thought they wouldn't have got much.

A Madelia lady called to see him and told him she was glad he fell into Christian hands, and would be well taken care of, and he said he was very grateful for it, but could not say he deserved it.

"Circumstances," he said, "sometimes make men what they are. If it had not been for the war I might have been something, but as it is, I am what I am."

Cole Younger said to the sheriff:

"Are you the sheriff?" and he replied, "Yes."

Cole then replied: "You will get the reward without doubt, but I want to ask one favor of you. If any of them cowardly sons of b—s of detectives come here don't let them in to see us; I don't want to see them nor have to talk to them."

He also told Mr. Estes that if they had chosen they could have shot him and several others, but did not desire to kill any more than they could help, although if they had seen any of the blue-coated police after them they would have picked them off, for they claim they can shoot with accuracy four hundred yards.

Soon after their wounds were dressed, Cole Younger seemed to be soliloquizing to himself, and was heard to say, "I don't believe it—I don't believe it." Upon being asked what he did not believe, he continued: "Byron says, 'Death is the end of all suffering—the beginning of the great day of nothingness;' but I don't believe it."

Among other things learned from them, they stated that the man Dunning, whom they made captive on the 13th near Shaubut's if he had a spark of manhood, would never, after the solemn oath he took, have exposed them. They say they passed through Mankato Wednesday evening, the 13th inst., and the whistle at the oil mill was blown just as they were going by. They supposed they were seen and the whistle was to give the alarm, so they went in back of the mill. They say they have never before been taken prisoners—not one of them.

Capt. McDonough, Chief of Police, St. Louis, accompanied by several others who had known the Youngers several years ago, visited them to identify them. It has been definitely ascertained that Cole and Robert Younger are certainly captured, but James Younger was not in the party. They arrived in St. Paul on Sunday morning, bringing with them accurate descriptions of all of the famous gang, and pictures of most of the gang. They identified at once the body of the dead man as that of Charley Pitts. Those who looked upon the picture they brought of that desperate looking bandit, could not but recognize the resemblance. The dead man is he beyond a doubt. The identification of the other three was not less prompt on arrival here. Two were declared to be Younger boys, and the third man, the one wounded in the mouth, as Al. Carter, a notorious desperado from Texas, who has been with the gang. The Younger boys are Bob and Cole. The men killed at Northfield have been known as Clell Miller and Bill Chadwell, though Chadwell is claimed to be Bill Stiles on very good foundation. It is very likely that the latter name has been adopted for the purpose of outlawry. Mr. Russel, who has known the Younger boys from the earliest time, says before the war they were not remarkably bad boys, but by no means the straightest-laced Sunday school scholars. They became members of Mosby's guerrillas, where they were initiated to deeds of blood and violence, and the life of a bushwacker, and have so lived ever since. The cruelty, the utter disregard of the many bloody rights of war, the cold-blooded atrocity of their deeds made them outlaws, to be hunted after the war's close, and therefore to be outlaws always.

A special dispatch to the Missouri Republican, dated at Fairbault, Minnesota, Sept. 26th, says that much excitement prevails over the capture of two of the Younger brothers. It was feared they would be taken from the jail and hung, but good counsel prevailed and no fears of lynching were now entertained. Cole and Bob Younger were not so badly wounded as at first supposed. A company of 75 well-armed men are on guard day and night, and fears were apprehended of a release of the prisoners by their friends.

A special dispatch to the Globe-Democrat, St. Louis, of the 26th, says that the James boys, or at least those supposed to be the James boys, are being still pursued, with the hope of yet capturing them.

The editor of the Mankato Review interviewed the Youngers, who told him the reason the cashier was killed was that he reached for his revolver and that one of the party killed him, as he supposed, in self-defence. The prisoners waived examination and were committed without bail.
